CARDINAL MANNING and his Episcopal colleagues hav just issued in London a Catholic directory, from which statistics of the state of the Roman church in that country hav been derived. From the list of members of the Sacred College of Cardinals it appears that there are now six cardinal archbishops, fifty cardinal priests, and twelve cardinal deacons, one of the latter being John Henry Newman. There are only two survivors of the cardinals whom Gregory XVI., the predecessor of Pius IX., created; three vacancies exist, and already in the present pontificate nine cardinals hav died. In Great Britain and Ireland and the colonial dependencies of England there are 14 Archiepiscopal and 77 Episcopal sees, besides 34 vicariates (sees held by vicars-apostolic) and 8 Episcopal prefectures. Including 11 auxiliary bishops there are now holding office within the limits of the British Empire 127 bishops and archbishops, with a few retired bishops, of whom four liv permanently in England. Of Roman Catholic peers there are 38, being an increase of three, and of Catholic baronets 48. The number of priests in England, Wales, and Scotland is 2,211. They serve 1,438 churches and chapels, not including the domestic and private chapels in houses of gentlemen and noblemen.

THE death and burial of Mr. G. C. Rankin, as well as his life, hav paramount claims on our attention this morning. Had he been as fervent a churchman as he was a Freethinker, his praise would be in all the churches. As it is, I suppose that this is the only place on earth where it is likely to be mentioned in public that this scholar and gentleman—the friend of Leigh Hunt, of Barry Cornwall, and other Liberal writers of a past generation—died on the third day of this new year. A good many years ago he (Mr. Rankin) became anxious that, after his death, his tombstone should testify to the principles and convictions of his life. So he carefully prepared his epitaph. But he vainly sought to find a cemetery which would agree to admit a stone engraved with such sentiments as his. Then he had an epitaph put on a marble slab, and paid a firm of marble-cutters in Regent street to exhibit it in their window, where it remained for a long time. But when he felt his end drawing nigh he secured what appeared to him the best compromise he could with the Kensal-green Company. They consented to admit the Latin part of his epitaph if he would omit most of the English part. The old gentleman was in his seventy-ninth year, too feeble to fight any more, and very reluctantly (as he told me) he had to surrender the pith of his epitaph made over by the Arimatheans of Kensal-green in a way characteristically Christian. The original epitaph, as he wrote it, was as follows: "G. C. R. &c., &c. 'Ignotum est quo modo et per quæ vivimus.' Neither Theist nor Atheist; but, in the hour of death, as in life, protesting in behalf of duped humanity against the impious craft of all proposed revelations of the unknown, as mere competitive varieties of ubiquitous predatory Sacerdotalism. 'Stabiliatur veritas ruat sacerdos.'" On the obelisk set up last week over this Freethinker the Latin sentences are preserved; but the English is cut down to the words, "Neither Theist nor Atheist." The old scholar's mind must hav lost some of its discrimination if he accepted that compromise. An ordinary reader, unacquainted with Latin, might easily conclude that in saying he was "Neither Theist nor Atheist," he meant to denounce the heresy of modern Theism, along with Atheism, from the standpoint of a Christian. The casual visitor to Kensal-green might say, 'This must hav been a monk who hated Theists and Atheists, and the other sentences must be from his Latin breviary.' We may remark, too, the willingness to allow learned men to indulge in heresy providing they put it in Latin and refrain from diffusing it among the common people.—From a sermon by Moncure D. Conway.

Natural and Divine Marriage against the Legal Institution of Marriage.

BY MORTIMER KING.

Is there any universally-recognized standard of morals? If not, has not every intelligent and sane person a right to form his own standard, according to his own convictions, of what is right and what is wrong, subject, however, to the grand law of nature that in the pursuit and enjoyment of his own happiness, and in order to live in just relations to his fellow-men, he must, in his acts, neither injure himself nor any other human being? These are the important questions I propose to discuss in this essay, and, if we can, arrive at the truth, to notice its bearing on the subject of love and marriage.

It is a singular fact that although mankind have been so long upon the earth, and have made and are constantly making so many other substantial attainments in civilization, there is as yet no universally-recognized standard by which to judge the right or wrong of human actions. There must be such a standard if men are moral agents and responsible for their doings. But the difficulty is to gather the verdict of all mankind, after an agreement on the merits of the question, that a certain class of actions shall always and everywhere be considered right, while the opposite class shall always be deemed wrong If there be a law of numbers which causes the truths of the multiplication table to be universally accepted, and if the law of gravitation, by its uniformity of action, causes a pound's weight to be accepted as such everywhere on the globe, it seems reasonable that for intelligent, moral, and accountable agents, living in crowds and sustaining close relations to each other, there should be a law governing those relations.

Webster, in his dictionary, defines the word morality to be "the conformity of an act to the divine law;" but this phrase is as uncertain in its meaning as the phrase "large as an apple," since we have apples of all sizes. Every one of the hundreds of existing sects into which the Christian church is divided has its own interpretation of what the "divine law" requires and forbids, and their antagonism to each other grows out of this fact. If Webster meant by this term the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, which was the constitutional law of the Hebrew commonwealth, and which is supposed to be universally binding, we must remember that the Old and New Testament transgressors all had that standard in their hands, and all professed to go and be governed by it as a rule of life, and all violated it. The neuter noun "morals" does not mean conduct consistent with the Jewish Decalogue, nor with any other universally-accepted standard, for there is none. It comes from the Latin mos moris—plural mores—and means the customs or manners of society, whatever they may be. The morals of mankind is, therefore, as different in different ages, countries, and races, as are their complexions and other physiological traits of character; so that what is deemed virtue in one age becomes hideous vice in the next. To substantiate this foundation fact, and to prepare it for the superstructure we would build upon it, let me cite the historical proof.

Twenty-five years ago the clergy, the lawyers, the doctors, and all the rest of what constituted the upper and controlling classes in fourteen states of this Union, held slaves, bought and sold slaves, and if they did not as a business breed slaves for market like cattle, had no objection, on a pinch in their affairs, to sell any offspring of a female slave born to them in their houses. These people—the most respectable in the South—considered slavery a divine institution, although it doomed its victims to total ignorance and drove the plowshare of ruin through the family relations, making slaves mere chattels, legally incapable of being either husbands or wives, parents or children. The respectability of the Southern slaveholding class was such that the respectability of the North caught the moral contagion, and soon came to see and say that slavery was not wrong; and thus the whole nation, except a handful, became pro-slavery in sentiment and practice. Had Garrison or Jay gone to the South on any errand, and were the fact known, they would have been arrested as criminals, and, although men of irreproachable conduct in all the relations of life, they would have been convicted by the courts of law or sent to the stake by mob law. Why? Because, by speech and by example they condemned the manners, the customs—the morals, in this respect—of Southern society.

At this day and for generations past bull-baiting has been the custom of the Spanish people on Sundays, after "divine service" in the morning. The king, the queen, and nobles, as well as the common people who can afford it, take infinite pleasure in seeing an animal tortured to death, and in witnessing the good or bad luck of the matadores and picadores as they show their skill in exasperating the bull and avoiding his rage in the arena. Such entertainments, as far as they go, constitute the morals and—the customs—of the Spaniards, and when the British Minister, who represents his government at Madrid, refuses to witness such revolting spectacles, and, instead, spends his Sundays at home reading his prayer-book, he subjects himself to the censure of the people as immoral—that is, he does not conform to the opinions and manners of the Spanish people, but arrogantly forms his own opinion and does as he deems right. But if the Spanish Embassy at London were to attempt to get up a bull-bait for the amusement of their countrymen in England, on Sundays, it would be prohibited by the authorities as immoral.

The Spaniards are a branch of the Latin race, and when the Latin, or Roman, empire was at the hight of its glory and power, gladiatorial conflicts were the grand amusements of the people. Men were trained by hundreds to fight and cut each other to pieces in the arena of the amphitheater. The bare description given in history of those scenes of cruelty, which continued for ages, curdles the blood of us moderns; and, were it not true beyond all doubt, we would deem it impossible that men and women of the highest taste and culture of those times could take pleasure in such exhibitions of barbarity. There were no doubt some who condemned such terrible scenes of carnage, but if they absented themselves from the entertainment, or expressed opinions contrary to the prevailing customs, they would have been deemed immoral. He who lives in Rome must do as the Romans do.

The standard of morals in Utah territory requires that—to give numerical strength to the church of Latter Day Saints, and to preserve Utah as a home for the Mormon faith—every good Mormon who is able to do so should marry a number of wives and have as many children as possible. The saints in the old dispensation, when God came nearer to man than ever before or since, practiced polygamy, as most of the oriental peoples still do. David, the sweet singer of Israel, and the man after God's own heart, had many wives. Solomon had seven hundred, and as if that were not enough, he had three hundred concubines, additional. These patriarchs, who were such favorites of heaven that they conversed with God only second-handed, and who are held up as models of piety in the New Testament, if they were living in the state of Massachusetts would be sent to prison as criminals.

The Rev. George Whitfield, the eminent revivalist, who flourished in England and in this country toward the close of the last century, was not only a holder of slaves, but condemned the laws which at that time forbade the introduction of slaves into Georgia. In his journal he writes, "Blessed be God for the increase of the negroes," meaning, thereby, a new arrival from the coast of Africa. He writes again in his journal, "I am determined to take no more orphans into the orphan house till I can buy more negroes."

The Rev. John Newton, who afterwards became the famous evangelical preacher in the Church of England, commanded a ship which traded in slaves on the coast of Africa; and he tells us that in his last voyage to Guinea "he experienced sweeter and more frequent hours of divine communion than he had ever elsewhere known." The horrors of the middle passage, when dead negroes were brought out from under the hatches every morning and thrown to the sharks that accompanied every slave-ship on the ocean, never shocked nor sickened his piety in the least. The moans of the dying never fell upon his ear painfully, and the stench which proceeded from their horrible conditions of neglect was never disagreeable to his olfactory nerves, and never interfered with the spirituality of his religious exercises, for he says in his journal, "No employment ever afforded greater advantages to an awakened mind than the command of a slave-ship." He had even descended so low in infamy as to become the overseer of a slave-barracoon on the Gold Coast, and, after thriving in that business for some time, became a partner of the firm. All this conduct was deemed entirely consistent with the highest-toned evangelical religion in England.

To come nearer home, this same slave-trade was practiced by our own fathers a century ago; and many families in Boston and elsewhere in New England are now enjoying wealth accumulated in that outrageous, yet most profitable, traffic. The United States Constitution allowed it to continue till the year 1808. It was, therefore, moral, and of course respectable, to engage in the business. But at 12 o'clock on the night of the 31st of December, 1807, the complexion of the custom changed instantaneously; and after that moment a practice which had been previously followed by the most religious people became piracy. Ten minutes before twelve it was moral and consistent with religion to be man-stealers and traders in the souls and bodies of their fellow-men. Ten minutes after, it was a crime punishable with death.

Now these cases—and I could quadruple their number—show that the word "morals" has no certain definite meaning like the words white, black, red, but means customs, manners, and is as changeable in different ages and countries as the fashions in regard to dress. Each age forms its own system of morals, and he is deemed immoral who does not conform to it. The best importance of this fact is seen when we remember that questions of right and wrong affect the permanent weal or woe of countless thousands of our fellow-beings.

I have intimated that, if there be an eternal difference between right and wrong, there must be a standard or rule by which persons in the social state may shape their course in life so as to have a conscience void of offense towards all men. The church, although professing and claiming to be the sole, infallible teacher of morals, has furnished no such rule, for she has justified every crime it is possible to commit; and the state has furnished no such rule, for it has legalized crime in various forms, and punished virtue. But common sense has furnished the desideratum, the thing desired, and declares this proposition to be true, that as every individual member of society has a sacred and inalienable right to form his own religious creed, taking the consequences, so he has the same right, taking the consequences, to make his rule or standard of morals to agree with his own intelligent conviction of what is right and what is wrong. We find that, from the cradle to the grave, every act of a human being's life is prompted by a desire to increase the sum of his happiness. Man is a complex being. He has an intellect which hungers for knowledge, its appropriate food. He has a body with many desires, all of which crave satisfaction, and he has affections which seek their object in holy love. Now, it is both a right and a duty, in order to secure a symmetrical development of character, to gratify all these desires, which spring from his threefold nature, with the single proviso that, in so doing, he inflicts no injury either upon himself or any other human being.

The merit of this rule of morals is that it is easily understood, that it applies to every age and country, and that it never changes in its character, but, like the polar star in the heavens, is fixed and visible, enabling the traveler, whether on the land or sea, to find out the way it is safe for him to go. It is more perfect than the Golden Rule of Confucius and of Jesus, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," for that love puts the neighbor first, whereas this natural, and therefore infallible, rule requires that since a man is nearer to himself than to any other being, he ought to love himself primarily, and so much as never by any practice to injure himself. It measures the amount of love we owe our neighbor by the amount we owe ourselves, and leaves it—not as the other rule does—to the discretion of that class of lop-sided philanthropists whose quixotic benevolence cares more for others than themselves. While it does not deny the rights of society, it maintains the individuality and independence of its members, and contends that the rights of society are only those which its members have delegated to it for public purposes of defense and not to suppress the liberty of the individual to form his own religious creed and his own standard of morals. It is summed up in the profound philosophy of Polonius's advice to Lærtes in Hamlet:

> "This above all—To thine own self be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou cans't not then be false to any man."

If we go beneath the surface of society, as indicated by its laws and passions, as we have a right to do in a radical discussion of a most important subject, we shall find that even in England, the most ostensibly religious nation in Protestant Christendom, the best classes are beginning to accept this theory in its application to love and marriage. Marian Evans, the most renowned writer of fiction in this age, lost no credit at all, either as a writer or a lady, because she sustained relations to Mr. Lewes that were not only not recognized but were actually forbidden, with penalties, by the laws and morals of England. Dean Stanley lost no credit when he met this famous couple in Westminster Abbey on Sunday, and assigned them seats of honor during divine worship. Sarah Bernhardt, another woman of ability, was never "married" according to law and morals now in vogue, but is the mother of four beloved children; nevertheless, she is as much admired and courted by the best English society as if she had been "married" by the Archbishop of Canterbury or Cardinal Manning. By her conduct she proclaims her conviction, and society, in a tacit but most substantial way, admits it, that society has no right to inquire about and meddle with her private relations at all, but that these are matters which concern herself alone. She is, therefore, treated as a lady as well as an artist, without Mrs. Grundy being allowed to demand, as a sine qua non, a sight of her marriage certificate.

In New York and other cities where it can be done without attracting public attention, married men and married women who, unfortunately, have been "married" but not mated, and therefore do not love, have other wives and other husbands whom they do love and fellowship, in silent defiance of the laws and morals of society. The fact is known to the "best" people, but it is no bar to social intercourse with them. However, really, and in view of the standard of morals now in fashion, the secret keeping of plural wives by respectable gentlemen in the East is just as wrong intrinsically as the open keeping of many wives by the saints in Utah territory; nay, worse, for the Mormon marries his wives, acknowledges them before the public, and provides for them and their children. But our Eastern polygamists, when they tire of their plural wives, cast them off, and leave them to neglect and dishonor. It is plain to see, however, that if the wealthy and influential classes who set the fashions for the rest persist in their secret polygamous courses, without incurring the blame of their associates, in either church or state, the time will come when the present custom will change, and a man with several wives will be deemed as "moral" in New York as such a man is now considered in Salt Lake City.

If the principles laid down in the preceding sentences of this article be correct, the day is near at hand when, upon the most important subject which underlies and gives character to our civilization—the proper relation between the sexes—men will ask and insist upon an answer whether divine marriage, or the union in love and confidence of the man and the woman, does not require the total abolition of the legal institution, leaving the sexes to manage their love relations as they please, always having prime regard to the educational and property rights of third parties, viz., the children that may be born of these relations. Every human being hates a chain which is the emblem of servitude, and the question is on the lips of thousands whether absolute freedom in love relations would not be a stronger guarantee against divorce and a better security for love and harmony in the family than if the man and the woman were fastened to each other by a wrought-iron chain. The very asking of these questions shows that the subject is a very difficult one, and has two sides; and the object of this essay is to discuss, not to decide—to evoke the thoughts, both pro and con, of those who have made it a subject of study, so that something may eventually be done to abate, if not abolish, the evils which grow out of unwise love and marriage. If we have a right to discuss the question of the being of a God, and express doubts whether the ideas entertained on that subject by the Christian church for long centuries are not wrong and injurious to mankind, surely we have the right to discuss the question of marriage, and to doubt whether the ancient ideas on this subject, which are embodied in our laws and customs, are not also wrong, and injurious to the best interests of the race. The laws concerning woman and her rights, in the capacity of wife and mother, have been improved during the last century. Why might they not be improved still further by making marriage a free instead of an enslaved condition, and the family a permanent and blessed institution?

In all past ages rulers have felt that it was unsafe to trust the people with liberty lest it run into license. Hence arbitrary governments where the will of one man is the law of the land. The same jealousy of freedom is observable in the law-makers, and in society, concerning the matter of love. Every man thinks that he himself would act well in the enjoyment of freedom in love, but he doubts whether it would do for other people, and his doubts are so strong that he is unwilling even to try any new general system, preferring a continuation of the present one with all its admitted evils. But is freedom in love the dangerous thing it is imagined to be? In the months of courtship how kind, attentive, and considerate lovers are! Why is it that in so large a proportion of cases it is all changed by marriage? Because during courtship the parties feel that they are free; that nothing binds them but the chains of a willing love; that on discovery of any radical fault of character, making marriage incompatible with happiness, the relation can terminate. As marriage is a purely legal relation, suppose that a state legislature, by an act, should annul every marriage in the commonwealth, what would be its effect upon married people? Why, every couple who loved each other would continue their relations as heretofore, only, that now being put upon honor, their love would be more chivalric and intensified. As for those who were held together only by the law, as two oxen are held together by the yoke, the legal tenure being broken, they would of course separate, as they ought, and avoid such relations in future for the same reason that a burnt child dreads the fire; or else they would seek new relations by which they might hope to promote their happiness. But in such a case what shall be done with the children if any there be? Why, by all means, give them to the mother who bore them and gave them life at the risk of her own, and bind the father to give them an adequate support.

I am free to admit that there are difficulties connected with this view of marriage and the family. But when a statesman or a philanthropist urges a certain course of state or social policy he is not bound to show that there are no difficulties in carrying it out, taking people as they are, but only that there are fewer than in any other proposed. There are *dis*advantages existing along side of all *ad*vantages. It is a serious objection to the rapidity of steam travel that passengers are liable to be killed by the carelessness of employees on the land, and by unforeseen storms upon the sea. These are risks we all must run if we go abroad, and we can only avoid them by staying at home. Yet all men, for the sake of speed in travel, agree to take the risks. Divine or free marriage must encounter similar difficulties growing out of the imperfections of human nature; but it is firmly believed that there is much less danger to the family institution when the parties are held together by the tie of love alone than where the law undertakes to regulate them by its pains and penalties.

That the love relation may be permanent and happy, and result in the establishment of a home, and the birth and education of good children, several things are indispensable. First, all women must be educated and have vocations by which they can make an independent living for themselves, and not be forced by the fear of want to marry men whom they do not and can not love. This education in its literary department must embrace, pre-eminently, the science of physiology, so that understanding the whole subject of sex, male and female, they may go forth and meet the stern realities of life armed against all temptation that may assail them from this quarter. Secondly, women must understand, if they experience the sentiment of personal love, which tends to result in marriage, that it must be based upon platonic love, since platonic love, which is an admiration of intellectual and moral qualities that never wear out, but become more and more attractive as years pass by, bears to personal love the same relations that the foundation walls of a house do to the superstructure. Thirdly, to extend the days of courtship all through married life, leaving the parties to hold each other by the same tenure that they did before they were recognized by society as man and wife. A wise woman will insist, and a decent man will cheerfully agree, that she preserves her own individuality as a moral agent, and does not become a mere appendage to her husband; that she retains the sole ownership of her own person; the sole occupancy of her own bed; that her privacy is sacred, thus avoiding the bad consequences of that familiarity which breeds contempt, and that commonness which always depreciates value. If, in addition to all this, she pays the same attention to her health and person which she did in the first instance when she won her husband's love, she will continue to be a beloved and happy bride all through her married life.

A despot is constantly tempted to trample upon his subjects, because he knows, and they know, too, that they are in his power. It is of the nature of an iron chain to be irksome to those who wear it. As the quiet and prosperity of free governments show that freedom is better for man, politically, than bondage, so the consciousness in husband and wife that they hold each other by the delicate, yet powerful tie of willing love has a stronger tendency to strengthen and perpetuate love than the feeling that they are manacled for life to each other by the forms of law.

If legal marriage did in fact but half it undertakes to do, we would have nothing to say but to pronounce a blessing upon it as an institution. But it is, in perhaps a majority of cases, a failure to secure the two grand objects of marriage, viz., permanent love between the wedded pair, and the birth and education of children who will be serviceable to the state and society; and hence we question its claims. Marriage, by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by all state laws, is merely a civil contract, nothing more and nothing less. Yet, when it is of the essence of a civil contract that it can be annulled, by a failure to obtain the object of its creation, and by a consent of parties, legal marriage defies its own definition, and perpetuates itself against the will of both parties, thus compelling them to live in a hell of discord, and to bring up children begotten in lust instead of holy love—unless it can be proved that one of the parties has committed adultery, or violated some other law that justifies a divorce. What right has marriage to call itself a civil contract, and then absolve itself from the conditions of a civil contract? The bare fact that the law is forced into the stupid and ignoble position of saying in the same breath that it is, and it is not, a civil contract; that it is, and is not, a popish sacrament, proves that it is meddling with a subject it does not understand, and has no natural right to meddle with.

But it is argued against divine marriage, where the parties are held by love alone, that we cannot trust a woman to the generosity of a man and the tender permanence of his love; that neither can we trust a man to a woman's love who fancies that by this theory she is free to accept any new suitor who may come within the influence of her attraction. But we do trust the grand sentiment of love in some of its manifestations. The law never sends its agents into the households of the people to see whether mothers treat their little children with kindness; it trusts the maternal instinct. Still, some mothers do neglect their children, but the great majority do not. Then why not trust the holy instinct of conjugal love so deeply rooted in our nature, so powerful, so considerate and chivalrous towards the object of its choice? Will it not behave itself as well, when enlightened and put upon its honor, as when it is suspiciously watched and meddled with by the law? This sentiment of honor is a mighty lever in the work of forming human character. Men will pay debts of honor which no law of the land could compel them to pay. Even thieves, who constantly defy the frowns of society and the restraints of the law, have been known to act honestly if trusted with money and put on their honor to repay it.

Besides, if husbands carried around with them a consciousness that they held their wives and the mothers of their children by the tie of love alone, would they neglect and dishonor them by falling into bad habits which make them repulsive and by spending their spare time away from home? Would any wise husband ever give occasion to his wife to observe the contrast between the attentions he pays her and those which other men offer her? Not one woman in ten thousand would ever feel her affections for her husband giving way if he treated her with the same loving respect that he manifested in the days of courtship. But many men, a year after marriage, feel and act as if the wife were his property, both in law and religion, and that, do as he will, she cannot escape from her servitude to him and is bound to submit. Then begins a life of legal domination on the one hand and legal subjection on the other, which would never be the case upon the theory we advocate. Then if mothers who are under no legal bonds can be, and actually are, safely trusted because of the known strength and permanence of maternal love, why not trust husbands and wives when the love that makes them such is the love of all loves—the primal love, without which there would be no other loves? The only right the law has to concern itself with marriage at all is to record the civil contract when it is made and the dissolution of the same in case the contracting parties find it best to dissolve it and to give directions about the disposition of property which parents leave when they die. This being done, all the rest should be left to nature, to reason, and to conscience.

The usual objection to this scheme of marriage is that, while it may be adapted to advanced minds, it would break up the family relation and spread moral and social anarchy through society if it were applied to the common people. To this it is replied that society is divided into three classes—the upper, which embraces, as a rule, the wealth and intellectual culture of the country; the middle, or industrial class, which creates by labor and thrift the wealth of the country; and the lower class, whose poverty and unthrift breed vice and crime; who furnish convicts for the prison, occupants for charity institutions of all kinds; and who, for these reasons, are not worthy to be taken into the present account.

Now it will be found on investigation that there is more discontent in married life among the upper than among the middle class in comparison to their numbers respectively. Wealth breeds luxury, and luxury breeds idleness, ennui, fastidiousness of taste, a consciousness of life without a purpose, and an unnatural discontent arising from the damming up of the natural courses of things, all of which wear heavily and constantly on the marriage tie and makes the love that leads to it an unreal thing. The middle, or industrious class, whose cares in presiding for present and future wants occupy so much of their time, are vastly more happy in their domestic relations. They have neither time nor disposition morosely to incubate and hatch out imaginary troubles. Wives are not silent partners in the firm, but have a consciousness of their importance to the household, which promotes their self-respect aud gains the confidence of their husbands. Among this class marriage is a more natural relation; and if it were only allowed to regulate itself, without the dictations of the law, would give infinitely less trouble than it does now, and this upon the principle generally conceded by thinking people to be a safe one, that liberty for man in all the relations of life, is better than whole or half slavery. An intelligent person will hate to be compelled to do that which, if left perfectly free, he would voluntarily and cheerfully do.

Let us suppose a case under the natural, and therefore divine, theory we propose of a misunderstanding and alienation between two lovers who are parents. Being humane, and not purely angelic, a hasty word, spoken under provocation, has acted like a spark of fire falling upon gunpowder, and both are hurt and angry at each other. A superficial thinker would say that now, being both free as air, they would separate. But a social philosopher would say, No. If the sun is allowed to go down upon the culmination of their wrath it will not shine upon it the next morning. Couscious that there is no legal tie that holds them together, but that each is at the other's mercy, the chivalry of love appears upon the scene, and pointing to the helpless children who lie sleeping in their beds, and who were born of the old love, proposes reconciliation. The proposition is accepted; the cause of the temporary disruption is cast into the sea of forgetfulness; and as the storms of winter loosen the roots of trees that they may grow and anchor themselves more deeply in the earth the next spring, so these lovers, warned by the past, avoid in future a recurrence of the cause which produced disaster, and love each other more intensely than ever. But suppose that, instead of the consciousness of freedom, which gives scope to the chivalry of love and generosity, these lovers felt that they were irrevocably chained together for better or for worse, the chain wearing into the bone, their quarrel would madden itself into sullen disruption and personal disgust that nothing would remedy.

This tinkering at the institutions of nature, as if she did not understand her own business, and could not be trusted in the performance of it, but must be supervised and dictated to by the "law," is one of the remnants of the old European system of "paternal" and "protective" government, which feels it to be its duty to look after the dress, the diet, the morals, and the religion of its subjects, thus keeping them forever in a state of helpless childhood. It does not belong to our system of free popular government, which only undertakes to guard the personal and property rights of the citizens, leaving every one to stand on his own legs and work out his own destiny under the great law of nature that in the pursuit of his own happiness, which is his right and duty, everything is lawful to him, provided he neither injures himself nor any other human being. The fundamental doctrine that lies at the basis of the American government, and gives character to our political and social ideas, being the very opposite to that which supports all the governments of the old world, we ought to have a social system corresponding to it. Let it be proclaimed, then, as the American doctrine, that home is a voluntary institution, in which a woman is chosen by her husband to be mistress and queen—an institution where children are trained up, from the start of their existence, to be good citizens of the republic, and good men and women in all the relations of life, and which will make the place where it is located, to both parents and children, the dearest spot on all the earth.

A False Alarm! A False Alarm!

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: With your permission I wish to reply to a slander upon Mr. J. P. Mendum, which appeared in the Index of January 22d, in which Mr. Charles Ellis publicly charges Mr. Mendum with stealing money donated to the Paine Memorial building.

And Mr. Abbot partially indorses Mr. Ellis, for he says there appears to be unimpeachable evidence on the two main points, namely, as to the validity of Mr. Mendum's title to the building, and second, as to the Paine Memorial Corporation's responsibility for the Lecture Fund. Both of the charges are refuted in the last Investigator by a letter from a noted Boston lawyer, Samuel W. Creech, Jr., Esq.

There is an old saying that "people who liv in glass houses should not throw stones." Mr. Ellis does not seem to heed that maxim of wisdom and prudence, but, like his friend Abbot, "goes it blind."

There is not one word of truth in the charges against Mr. Mendum, and therefore the stockholders of Paine Memorial Corporation thought they were entirely unworthy of being noticed.

While Mr. Ellis only made these charges privately I did did not think them worthy of notice, but now that the Index is circulating them all over the country I feel it my duty to speak in Mr. Mendum's defense.

I hav been intimately acquainted with Messrs. Mendum and Seaver for the last ten or twelve years, and of late I hav had many dealings with Mr. Mendum, and I must say that I feel as well satisfied of his entire honesty as I do of my own, and Mr. Ellis himself told me that he thought I was an honest man. But I will say further that I feel like indorsing a stronger statement repeatedly made by Mr. Seaver, who has intimately known Mr. Mendum for forty years, namely, that "there is not an honester man living than J. P. Mendum."

But what shall we say of the conduct of Mr. Abbot in publishing these slanders? He appears to me to hav lost his common sense, or he would hav known better than to publish and circulate such unfounded charges against a brother Liberal, without first inquiring into the truth of the charges, especially if it be true, as he says in the same paper, that he had never had the slightest trouble with Mr. Mendum. This only makes his case worse. How easy it would hav been for him to hav asked Mr. Seaver or Mr. Mendum about those serious charges before publishing them. I wonder if he remembers what he once said to Mr. Hallowell, who I consider had a greater claim on the Index than Mr. Ellis? He pleaded then his moral responsibility. Has he no moral responsibility to Mr. Mendum, whom he declares he never had the slightest trouble with? "O consistency, thou art a jewel!"

Further, he might hav inquired of his friend B. F. Underwood, who, three years ago, sat six long days in summer on a committee investigating the same charges of dishonesty against Mr. Mendum, when it was unanimously voted that there was no evidence of any intention to defraud the Paine Memorial Building of its funds, and Mr. Mendum was exonerated from all blame, and here I giv you the language and names of that committee:

And the committee submit, further, that while they find some errors, they discover no evidence of intention to misappropriate funds donated to the building.

A. B. Brown, Chairman.
Charles Ellis, Secretary.
Owen Jones.
B. F. Underwood.
J. S. Verity.

These errors, let me say, were immediately corrected by Mr. Mendum when discovered.

Mr. Ellis ought to hav asked Mr. Mendum's pardon, and ever after hav remained silent. What was the purpose and object of these charges except to defeat, if possible, the success of the Paine Memorial Corporation, the only possible plan of saving the Paine Memorial Building?

But here let me say, thanks to the friends of J. P. Mendum, the subscribers of the Boston Investigator, who know Mr. Mendum better, it would seem, than Mr. Ellis does, for it is by their subscribing for the Paine Memorial stock that we now feel sure of saving the Paine Memorial Building for the important purposes for which it was originally intended, namely, a home for the Boston Investigator, and a memorial to the memory of Thomas Paine. What, I ask again, shall we think of Mr. Abbot's conduct in this exposure business? I am sorry to feel compelled to say that it appears to me that since the split in the Liberal League, at which he was deposed as its president, he appears to take it for granted, without investigation, that all those who differ from him on the question of repeal or modification of the Comstock laws are nothing but a gang of Freelovers, libertines, and scoundrels; and he feels justified in publishing any kind of scandal about them, and goes for their scalps like a wild Indian savage, rather than a "cultured" Free Religionist.

In conclusion, let me say that I did not expect anything different from Mr. Charles Ellis. It is an old business with him. What better could we expect from the man who, under the cowardly mask of Bundy's "special agent," could strike the brave and noble D. M Bennett while he was suffering as a martyr to free thought and free speech in an orthodox hell? What was Mr. Bennett's crime? Simply believing with thousands of other Liberals that Mr. E. H. Heywood had as good a right to publish and circulate his opinions as Anthony Comstock, F. E. Abbot, or Joseph Cook had to circulate theirs. I envy not the head or heart of any professed Liberal that could strike D. M. Bennett while he was suffering in prison a martyr to liberty.

"A Little Lecture."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a recent issue of The Truth Seeker, Mr. Babcock has an article, "A Little Lecture," in which, to my mind, are some very grave errors, against which I desire to enter my most earnest protest. It is not only unjust, but uncalled for, for those who represent one phase of Liberalism to be throwing clubs so thoughtlessly, if not spitefully, at other Liberals who do not believe exactly as they do. There are many phases of Liberalism, and all waging war on priestcraft, ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. In time of war it is wise to be united. Now I am certain that in all this grand array there are none more zealous in the cause, or whose work tells more effectually, than Spiritualists. They are of themselves a grand array of noble men and women, who are always at the front, and are found leading in every charge upon the enemy's strongholds. Our common enemies hate us with all the intensity of their black and cowardly hearts, and hurl at us continually the concentrated poison of their slanderous weapons. But this is not the worst. While our whole energies are being exerted to overcome the great enemy in front, we are constantly receiving from certain Materialistic bigots in our rear, who should be our friends and allies, a most galling fire, stinging with irony and ridicule—"spooks," "spirits," "lunatics," "fools," "humbugs," etc., etc. And this, too, from those who hav never given Spiritualism more than a passing thought—never hav fairly and fully investigated it. The great Huxley gave the cue to all the smaller fry when he said so pompously that "Spiritualism was not worthy his exalted attention." He had "matters of more consequence to attend to;" had "no desire to investigate it;" and yet this all-wise and mighty bigot dares to pronounce Spiritualism a humbug. Huxley, Tyndall, Lankester, Carpenter, Youmans, Brown, and Babcock having decided that "death ends all," therefore Spiritualism is superfluous and investigation of the phenomena entirely unnecessary and beneath their notice. These Materialistic bigots, so-called men of science, who refuse to investigate, treat Spiritualism precisely as the church has treated every advanced idea—every encroachment truth has made upon their strongholds from the time of Galileo to the present. I see no difference between a Christian bigot and a Materialistic or scientific bigot. Let those who would not take stock in bigotry investigate freely and fully all questions in search of truth, or hold their peace.

When they shut their eyes and turn a deaf ear to phenomena like those which accompany modern Spiritualism, and pronounce it a humbug, they are bigots of the rankest kind. They ignore the fact that thousands of the greatest men and women living declare that they hav investigated thoroughly, and found a vast amount of evidence which could come from no other source than a power and intelligence in spirit life. Crookes, Varley, Wallace, Zollner, Haeckel, Owen, Sargent, Edmunds, Cox, Buchanan, Eccles, Kiddle, and a host of the most learned and scientific men and women of our day, declare themselves convinced absolutely, after the most patient and rigid investigation, that the so-called spirit manifestations are what they purport to be. Corner any of these high, mighty Materialists, and ask them if they hav investigated the subject, and we get almost invariably the stereotyped answer, "Yes, a number of years ago they detected something, or somebody, or had heard something, and therefore the whole business is humbuggery." They don't like to get out of that old Materialistic rut. How it is possible for them to believe in "mind reading," "unconscious cerebration," "psychic force," "odyllic force," mesmerism, magnetism, electricity, sunlight, or gravity is more than I can conceive. And yet they must feel, taste, smell, handle, and weigh a spirit, or cipher it out by some rule of three, or else these manifestations are worthless and Spiritualism a myth, fit only for "lunatics and fools."

Mr. Babcock says, in his "Little Lecture," a belief in "heaven, hell, God, soul, spirits, and spooks" has worked a vast amount of mischief and bloodshed. He gives us a wonderful demonstration (?) as proof positive (?) that man has no soul or spirit, consequently no life or existence after death. He would cork a man up in a glass jar, so as to catch his spirit and hold it till "the day of pancakes." Eureka! The great problem is solved at last! Now let mankind rest in peace! Babcock has got a soul bottled up in a glass jar, so that Gabriel himself can't get it out! Glass will do it! I fear he has never noticed that light passes freely through glass. He never heard of the universal ether which scientists prove exists throughout space; that it is denser than steel, and to which matter is no obstruction whatever. I say scientists claim to prove and believe in the existence of such an ether, but they cannot taste, handle, feel, see, hear, smell, or bottle it; and yet Mr. Babcock claims he can bottle up a spirit and hold it till "the day of pancakes." We shall next hear that he has caught and bottled the rainbow, and then we shall hav another flood.

I think Mr. Babcock is getting dangerous. Again, he claims because a child can "create a black bear out of a stump, when he becomes a man he can create ghosts, gods, devils, hells, souls, and spirits." He tells us investigation will satisfy us that we, as men and women, are more mistaken than when we were children.

Now, will Mr. Babcock be so good as to inform the public how thoroughly he has investigated Spiritualism? If he has been one-half as thorough and rigid and scientific as was Mr. Crookes, of England, in his investigations, who spent three long years continuously searching for the truth, we may perhaps yield up somewhat of our knowledge, but until he furnishes some stronger and more tangible proof than an imaginary glass jar to disprove Spiritualism, we shall continue in the full belief and enjoyment thereof. In the meantime all honor to him for the grand work he is doing in the cause of truth and universal freedom. For his courage, zeal, and untiring industry, future generations will honor him as one of the heroes who dared fight for universal liberty against the hosts of superstition.

Socialism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Being an earnest seeker after truth, and knowing how history has so often proved (or, rather, time proved) the correctness of what when first ventilated appeared the wildest sophistry, I am slow to judge, either harshly or hastily, the motives that inspire the agitators of any apparently dangerous and wicked radical change. Having, however, tried to look impartially, and from an unprejudiced point of view, for some good feature as regards at least American and European Socialism, I trust you will allow me to pass a few remarks on the subject, and probably to ask a few questions relative to the same.

I was really sorry to read Mr. Sotheran's letter in your issue of December 27th, proving, as it did, his sympathy with "Liverpool dock ranters, California sand-lotters, and Pittsburgh rioters," for surely such ignorant and brutal exponents of any society are a danger to the general commonwealth and a disgrace to humanity. I can understand and indorse sympathy with the German Socialists in Germany and Russian Nihilists in Russia, but can neither sympathize with nor respect in the slightest degree people who in free and constitutional countries revolt on the slightest pretext, wantonly destroy property, and hesitate not to shed blood whenever, owing to natural consequences, hard times prevail. Does Mr. Sotheran, an intelligent man, suppose for one minute that any law could possibly make all men equal for a single week—even supposing the whole wealth of a land were actually divided equally amongst the people?

As to Mr. Sotheran's eight-hour and ten-hour arrangement, it is equally silly with the dividing-up process. We all know that there are always drones in every class who will not work, and I hav never yet met a fellow-workman of the slightest honesty, intelligence, or industry who advocates any such wild doctrines as the American Socialist of the present day advocates. If we kill enterprise and all prospect of advancement which tends to thrift, industry, and progress—essentials to the attainment of the same—we destroy human progress in fact, and no nation can attain greatness under the same conditions. Capital and labor are dependent upon each other, and so far from being enemies should be the last to quarrel. I agree that great monopolies of wealth are a curse, but as yet see no practical and honest preventive. I think, however, that in countries where the people hav the power to constitutionally administer the laws to their own satisfaction through the ballot-boxes, it is that people's own fault if they do not exercise sufficient care, judgment, and intelligence to return only such men to represent them as can be depended on to remedy all abuses and provide barriers against future assaults of scamps and money grabbers.

I myself am a workingman who gets his living by the sweat of his brow, and who harbors no hatred toward more favored mortals, knowing as I do that were I similarly situated with the more favored ones I should be no more willing than they are to divide up. When we hav the legal remedy for evils in general in our own hands, we are worse than fools not to make use of them but in place howl about the "example of French Communists."

Answers to "Inquirer."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In answer to Inquirer in last Truth Seeker, I will say that just now my health is such that I cannot attend promptly to my part of the discussion with Mr. Truesdell, but if he (Inquirer) will wait and read carefully he may become enlightened upon the interest problems—which he is not, provided those four questions are his honest thoughts.

Respectfully, H. H. Morrison.

Charleston, Ill., Feb. 4, 1880.

Usury and Debt.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: "Inquirer," on page 71 of your paper asks, "Is there any law in operation in any state of the Union that would compel Mr. Morrison or any one else to borrow money and pay interest thereon?" In reply: I do not know of any state law of that kind, but will assure my friend that there is just such a law in force. There is a law that ties the money of the country fast to a specie basis. Lately it has been placed, practically, upon a gold basis, and the mighty power of concentrated wealth is determined to keep it there. This law utterly fails to take into account the rapidly growing population, or the changed condition of their wants, caused by the unparalleled development of machinery and division of labor. It fails to note that five dollars are needed now where one sufficed under the regime of barter and "trade." It takes no cognizance whatever of the volume of exchanges required. They may be increased tenfold, but it matters not. Money, the great agent of the exchange and distribution of the products of labor, is anchored fast to gold, and there it must stay. Our resources may be inexhaustible but they must not be developed faster than gold can be procured to handle them. The wheels of industry must be stopped and the people suffer and starve until a few more pounds of glittering gold can be extracted from the bowels of the earth. All this must be done, or the people be "compelled to borrow money"—no not money but inflated bank credit—"and pay interest thereon" before they can exchange the products of their labor. Such a law not only "compels people to borrow money," or its substitute, and pay interest thereon, but it paralyses and cripples all the industries of the nation. It turns the business of the country into a huge game of chance, in which the trump card is gold. It makes us a nation of speculators and sharpers and fosters every species of gambling and crime.

I heartily indorse what Mr. Morrison says in regard to the evil of usury, but I differ from him in this respect. I claim that an insufficient amount of currency is the parent of usury. There being more exchanges to make than there is money to make them, a pressing demand is created for money. Here is the secret of the money-changers' business. Limit the volume of money as far below the requirements of business as possible, and usurious credit must make up the deficiency. Usury may and doubtless does, by reflex action, produce contraction, but it is not the primary cause. Its direct effect is the concentration and consolidation of wealth in the hands of the few, which indirectly produces contraction; but in and of itself there is no more wrong in hiring the money that will exchange for a horse than there is in hiring the horse. But when money is made scarce, the amount that should only exchange for one horse will exchange for two or three, and will therefore rent for two or three times more than it should; and here is where the evil appears. If the volume of money was always sufficient to properly transact the business of the country, no person could get more for its use than it would earn in business, nor as much, and very little would be borrowed. Why should there be laws limiting the rate of interest any more than there should be laws limiting the rents or hire on everything else. Is it not an authoritative confession that the volume of money is insufficient? Is it not an acknowledgement that owing to its scarcity money-loaning is the best-paying business in the land? Were the volume of money sufficient for the requirements of business, money-loaning would soon become the poorest business, and the interest-suckers and drone would hav to go to work. But as it is, it is the best-paying business in the world. The great industries of the world, by means of which the nations are fed and clothed, are carried on mainly by credit, for which usury is paid. Cost what it may, money or its substitute must be had to make the necessary exchanges and keep the wheels of industry in motion. Suffering humanity demands it, and, under penalty of starvation and death, the people are "compelled to borrow money and pay interest thereon." Labor may create wealth in abundance, but unless it can be properly distributed it is almost worthless. In our present civilization barter is practically abolished; hence money is the only agent that can effect this necessary distribution, and to do so properly it must be sufficient in volume. Let this be done and the people will soon free themselves from those twin monsters, usury and debt. Capital and labor would no longer war upon each other. Labor would then know that the "mechanism of exchange" would be sufficient to properly utilize all the wealth her enterprise and ingenuity could produce, and idleness, beggary, and crime would soon skulk away from the land.

Mr. Editor, I revere the memory of the noble men who spent their lives and died to free mankind from the shackles of priestcraft. I honor the grand old hero who now languishes in prison for the same great cause. Their sufferings and labors hav badly scotched the monster, and to-day it would be sick unto death were it not warmed into life by its twin brother, moneycraft. This is the able-bodied monster that is supporting and protecting its wounded confederate. You can never abolish hell until it has been abolished on earth. Nothing can satisfy the desire for heaven hereafter until heaven has been established in the present. As long as a few can win by chance the control of the life-blood of business, and use it to the detriment of the many, priestcraft will continue to liv. Moneycraft must go down, but the magnitude of the task may be imagined when we see educated and intelligent men defending it with all the fervor and earnestness with which a like class, centuries ago, defended and upheld the Spanish Inquisition. Theoretically we may achieve religious and political independence, but we will never be free until our industrial independence has been secured. This never can be done until money is founded upon and made subservient to the demands of business without the necessity of floating the millstone of usury and debt. Progress is stamped upon all the activities of man. Steam and electricity are working changes with marvelous rapidity. Shall everything else move forward, and money alone remained chained to the conditions of the past? It cannot be. Such a state of affairs would deluge the earth with blood and consign the world to anarchy.

The Idea of a Soul.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In The Truth Seeker of Jan. 31st, Mr. Wm. S. Deed, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., seems to take exception to an article of mine published in the same paper bearing date Jan. 10th. My article was written in answer to questions propounded by Wm. M. Ridinger. If Mr. Ridinger and Mr. Deed do not know the definition of soul, I would refer them to Webster's Dictionary. To the question, "What is the soul composed of that after the death of my body it is in danger of suffering or capable of enjoying happiness?" I answer, soul being life and all the sensation and intelligence of the body, it is the only part that can suffer, in or out of the body; a lifeless body cannot suffer or enjoy happiness. I think, Mr. Deed, that the above explanations are based on facts too plain for any man of common sense to deny.

The next question of Mr. Deed is, "How I know the soul is progressive from the atom up to man?" I did not say I knew it; I only said I would giv my views on that subject, and Mr. Deed can accept or deny it just as he pleases. If you deny it, sir, please giv us some of your mighty wisdom instead thereof. Mr. Deed seems to think because a man cannot remember his former existence from the atom up to man he has no soul. I would ask the gentleman if he can remember all that has transpired from his infancy up to the present state? I deny the possibility of you or any one remembering one-half of this earthly existence, for fully one-half has been spent in unconscious sleep. If this is a fact, according to your own reasoning, you hav no soul life or intelligence.

Your next question is, "Will the soul eternally exist?" If the soul is anything, it is substance or matter, for that which is not substance or matter is nothing. As you are a Materialist you will answer your own question. If substance or matter had no beginning it can hav no ending. I state that the soul is something, and something must hav eternally existed in some form. The soul atom is a microcosm or a little world within itself, having all the possibilities of any other entity. It never was begotten; it had all forms of life in heart within its own nature, through which it will ever pass. It is a soul-existing atom and cannot be divided, for it is the least of all matter; it is the infinitesimal seed from which all life springs, or in other words it is the little leaven that will leaven the whole lump. With regard, sir, to your poetic effusion, I will paraphrase it thus:

I say a progressive soul-atom is divine.
This is not said to puzzle or make it rhyme.
Your great eternal existing matter imaging,
Pray do not destroy or cage it;
Bring it to me with the soul and I will guage it.
I must confess, like apes I do not like to chatter,
But yet I like to know the soul as well as cause or matter.

A few questions for materialists to answer.

Did life and intelligence, which is the faculty of the soul, produce form and giv the five senses to the body? or did a lifeless and senseless body produce and giv life and sensation to the soul? If you answer according to the Materialist—that the brain governs the mind or soul and produces all the sensations of the body—will you tell me, if your reasoning is a fact, why the body lets the mind or soul depart at death? If the body governs, please tell me why the germ or seed does not die the same as the germ of the body. Which is the oldest—the seed or the body that ultimated it? or, in other words, which is the first—the acorn or the oak—the hen or the egg? Which matter is the oldest that which composes the body of the father or son? I find it easier to ask questions than to answer them.

Woman in and out of the Church.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: We hav labored long and accomplished much among men for the Liberal cause. But at this point we may ask ourselves why is it that in spite of the fact that nearly every intelligent, disinterested man is a Liberalist, and about half of the rest of the men are indifferent to church matters, still the churches flourishingly exist? Does not any one see at a glance that there are two sources of this prosperity—first, by far, the support given by women; secondly, the support the churches receive as society institutions. The latter depending upon and growing out of the former. The churches are a means by which many men obtain recognition in social circles, and finally wield a powerful influence.

Why is it that women cling so the churches? Simply because it is only through them that the ambitious, thinking women who lead hold their influence. Whenever women hav literary and suffrage societies their interest in the church rapidly ceases. It is therefore to be desired by Liberals that the women everywhere shall form such societies. Let nothing be said of woman's rights where the prejudice is too great. Simply let the women form social literary societies in every village, and the right question will come up by a natural evolution. I hav seen this thing effected more than once. All it needs is for two or three leading women to begin and organize and meet regularly. Let them renew their school girl days, hav readings, recitations, essays, speeches. How the priests will writhe and worry. Admit no man. Several years ago a few of such societies were started in Western villages, and every one is flourishing. Some hav considerable money and manage all the lecturing business, hav libraries, etc. Wherever such a society is started in five years the good result is seen in the independence and intellectual brilliancy of the members. And oh, how the churches do lag under it. Hoping that hundreds who may read this will use their efforts to start such societies, I remain, Liberty.

Card to the Auxiliary Leagues and to the Members of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League.

Ladies and Gentlemen: It is desirable to hav statistics of the number of churches and their value in the United States, for immediate use in our work of secularization. It will be about two years before the United States census will be completed and published, and the League can make good use of the facts in advance of that time. You will therefore render the cause a great service by gathering the figures on these two points in your several places and vicinity. The member af the Executive Committee for a state can call on some capable Liberal in each county of his state to work up the counties by towns and cities. The reports in all cases should be made to the Committee for the state, and when complete as possible forwarded to me by that Committee. I shall print and distribute proper blanks as soon as possible.

The Three Popes.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Three popes govern this world, and each pope has his followers and admirers.

The Romish pope, the man-made pope, who professes to be infallible; the Protestant pope, man-made, also professes to be infallible, only the Protestant pope is a dead pope—the Bible; the naturalist's pope, nature, the only true and infallible pope, who has existed from eternity, and will exist through all eternity, without beginning and without end—the true and mighty pope before whom both Romish and Protestant popes must bow and obey, these two popes, one a man, and the other a book, one alive and the other dead. The dead pope lived at least two thousand years ago, among a foreign people, whose language is nearly lost, their manners, customs, and tastes being forgotten. Their laws and institutions were barbarous. Yet these barbarians hav their dead pope handed down by a certain class of men called Protestants. The followers of this dead book make their dead pope teach so many different doctrines that it would be an impossibility to believe them all, yet to be saved one ought to believe them all; then one would surely light upon the right one. If belief is like other things, too much being as bad as too little, then one will be damned for believing too much, or damned for believing too little. Therefore one does not known when the right quantity of faith is kept in the holy and pious heart. The living pope of the Romish church solves this knotty problem. He offers to all the children of the true Catholic faith a hell-fire insurance. He says to his children by the mouths of his bishops and priests: Our church is infallible. You submit your reason to the church. You follow and believe all that the church teaches. The church cannot err. If you follow all her doctrines, keep all her sacraments, pay all her contributions, being faithful and obedient, the church will be responsible for your salvation. The church knows she cannot err, therefore there is no fear. Obey the church, and the church will take care that you are not damned. Should there be any fear in your mind, dismiss it, because the church is your responsibility, and will be damned in your place. This is the teaching of an infallible hell-fire insurance society. The head of that society is the living pope. The dead Protestant pope allows each man to think for himself, and to be damned for himself. Then what right has the dead pope to tell men that unless they believe this and that, they shall be damned, unless he will take the responsibility and be damned for them? The preacher of the dead pope leads. Whoever tells me that if I do not believe in Christ I shall be damned, ought, in justice, to take the responsibility, for if I am led wrong the fault is not mine, but my guide's. When the blind leads the blind both fall into the ditch together, therefore I, for one, will not be led blindly. I want to know will my leader be responsible for all damages if he leads me into the ditch. If not, then I will not be led by him. If yes, then start at once a Protestant hell-fire insurance society, and the dead and living popes will be rivals in the race of fire insurance companies. I for one would sooner hav cold, philosophical Atheism, and follow admiring nature, who points with her unerring finger to eternal rest after death, for my pope, than either the living or dead pope. Charles Audley.

Obituary.

Lyman Mory, seventy-two years of age, a justice of the peace, and a consistent Liberal, whose vital force was exhausted by the ravages of pneumonia, returned to Mother Earth on January 28th, leaving a large circle of friends to mourn his loss. After giving his son Louis directions in regard to his business, he requested him to say to his friends that he had no fears of the future after death.

The Two Moralities.

I do not remember ever to hav seen printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," as platformed by the Index. If they hav been, no matter—it won't hurt readers to consider them again in the light of recent events. The "Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism," standing in the Index for a year or more, disappeared out of its columns immediately after I had the unhappiness to pillory its editor on the sharp and piercing spike of the 3d Law. I am looking to see the "Nine Demands" go the same way at an early period, and I ask THE TRUTH SEEKER to rescue them while it is yet day. Here they are:

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of the Index, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

These Demands exactly voiced the Liberal sentiment, not only of the hour when they were formulated and given to the world, but of all time. Mr. Abbot feels, or feigns, altogether too much modesty in claiming for them only his own "explicit approval." They are universally approved. Mr. Horace Seaver, the veteran editor of the Investigator, gave expression to that approval very recently when, on resigning his vice-presidency in the League of "America," he wrote to Mr. Abbot: "I hav long given you the credit and praise privately and publicly of having formulated the 'Nine Demands of Liberalism,' in which I most thoroughly believe and shall always maintain, for I consider them without a flaw."

Now the first seven and the ninth of these demands are universally approved and well understood among Liberals. So indeed is the eighth universally approved, but it is not quite as well understood in all its bearings. Less has been written about it, and hardly any writer has called attention to it or laid any stress upon it—and yet it is the most important Demand in the series, and the most justly made. We could better waive every other or all other of the Demands. The first three refer to mere matters of money, and if conceded by church and government would not make an average difference of a dollar a head to the Liberals of the United States. The principle of the thing is what is contended for more than the amount of money. The fourth is very important, but not the most important. The wrongs whose removal is demanded in the sixth and seventh press very lightly as yet on any Liberal in this country. The ninth ranks next to the eighth, and should be unflinchingly and continually demanded; but there is no question of personal liberty in it. It demands only equality in religions, and demands no religion in government.

Now look at the eighth Demand. Study it attentively. See what is involved in it and what it demands. Its subject matter is Christian morality; and it is under Christian morality that Mr. Bennett is in prison. It is to enforce Christian morality that the Comstock laws of 1873 were enacted, and Comstock himself, backed up by Abbot, the very author of this Demand, is the cruel and cowardly instrument to execute that law in favor of Christian morality and against natural morality. Under that law Christian morality has now imprisoned three editors and mulcted a fourth with a heavy fine; and under Christian morality, as now sustained by that law, every Liberal editor in this Union holds his liberty only by sufferance, and is out of jail only because Comstock is not yet ready to lay a trap for him and put him in. The eighth Demand is as much more urgent, and should be as much more unflinchingly maintained, as personal liberty and freedom of the press are more important than mere matters of money. If Liberals could succeed immediately in enforcing this eighth Demand, Mr. Bennett would come out of prison instantly, and he and Lant, Heywood, and Dr. Foote would be indemnified for the loss of their liberty and their property. When all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, no more editors or writers will go into jail on the ground of its violation.

Now let us look a little closer into this Christian morality which Mr. Abbot, in his early, gushing days did not want enforced—the same Mr. Abbot who now disagrees with the Free Religious Association and goes into a minority of one because they propose to form Local Societies and so run the risk of getting in some member or some Society who won't enforce Christian morality. What is Christian morality? I lately brandished the Torch of Science around perhaps rather carelessly in reference to Christian marriage. Now this Christian morality is a cognate subject and a good dark place to illuminate with some of the same rays.

Christian morality is mainly that giant monopoly which the civilized world has granted to the priesthood in all matters pertaining to sex. Christian morality allows the priesthood to call women and children, and such men as will obey the call, into its confessional, under penalties for absence or failure as fearful as the statute law imposes for crime. The priesthood there catechises young children, tender girls, and married women, concerning the most delicate matters of their lives, and the priesthood make use of the knowledge there gained for their own passional purposes.

Christian morality, by ecclesiastical law, formulates the dogma of total depravity, denounces sex and sex manifestations as vile, beastly, degrading (and hereunto Mr. Abbot, Mrs. Underwood, and others of that class of Liberals now consent), and enacts that all manner of sex indulgence is sin unless permitted, incantated, blessed, sealed, and sanctioned by the priesthood. Then these sinners, after they hav confessed, and if they fairly, fully, and unreservedly confess, are granted absolution for their irregularities and remission of sins; and this absolution and remission are granted for money, and the sinner is secured entrance into heaven for so much money paid for priestly intercession.

Christian morality denounces Mr. Smithson, founder of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington, and thousands of other men as good as he, as bastards because God made them without any authority from the priesthood.

Christian morality denounces as an unpardonable sin in woman—unless she has money enough to make it pardonable—the same act that is a practical virtue in man.

Christian morality indorses and finds a place in its system for prostitution, as in a previous article I hav instanced; and Christian morality divinely inspired right out of the Word of God, and an omnipotent God at that, is powerless to find a remedy for the social evil, consequently it has perforce to adopt it, excuse it, and forgive its father's sons and brothers who become its devotees.

Christian morality makes a harem of every church in Christendom with free range for the priest among its houris. The priesthood throw a thin veil of moral law for their people and for the rank and file over this matter, but they hav no thought nor intent of obeying the moral law themselves. To whom does any priest, or bishop, or pope confess? The newspaper press is full day after day—sometimes half a dozen cases on the tapis for gossip at once—of discovered violations of their own theoretic moral law, and these discovered cases are but a very small per cent of the illicit priestly indulgences which never get found out. This style of scandal, however, is so common now, the public ear is so dulled, dazed, and sated, that many clergymen hardly think it worth while any longer to take pains to cover up their tracks. Then when they are discovered they hold up their holy hands in surprise that anybody should suppose it a sin or a violation of the moral proprieties.

Now this is Christian morality, and these are the buzzards who endeavor to enforce the acetic, Puritanic phase of it upon outsiders. These are the bright and shining lights who put forward Joe Cook and Bundy and Abbot and Comstock, especially Joe Cook, to talk about "cancer planters." In the language of Hosea Biglow:

> "Ain't they a prime set of fellers?
> For they think on't, they will sprout,
> Like a peach that's got the yellers
> With the meanness bustin' out!"

There is more to this Christian moral story, but this will do. These posies, sweet scented, culled from the general fragrance, will answer as specimen nosegays from the Christian moral garden.

Now I hav left a small space to turn the torch on natural morality to see and say what that is. It must be left for another article.

Paine's Birthday.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The one hundred and forty-third anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine was suitably observed in this village by an enthusiastic meeting at Spiritual Hall, with D. L. Barnes in the chair.

A. K. Brush being called, responded in a forcible speech, in which he dwelt particularly upon the services of the Author-Hero in securing American independence.

Dr. Phillips and others spoke briefly, after which memorial poems were read; and a very able address, eulogizing the life and labors of the great founder of Freethought, was delivered by our townsman, M. D. Morris, Esq.

With a few pertinent and timely remarks from the chair the meeting adjourned.

M. F. TUCKER, Sec.

Moses Hull to Speak in New York.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Moses Hull, of Boston, will address the Spiritualists and Liberals at Republican Hall, 55 W. 33d street, on Sundays, Feb. 22d and 29th. His subjects will be "The Comparison between the Evidences of the Resurrection of Jesus and Those of Modern Spiritualism," and "Biblical and Modern Spiritualism." Please extend invitation to the Liberals to attend.

Increase of Crime.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: My idea is, "Hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may." Crime is on the increase, no one can doubt for one moment. Its cause is a public question, and while it appears difficult to answer, perhaps through fear of public censure and the real true answer being unpopular, yet it seems to me very simple and easy to explain.

Let me take for an illustration any one individual who may read this article. Ask yourself, "Would I work for a bare living without profit?" Almost invariably your answer would be, "I would, rather than starve; but not otherwise."

This one idea lingers within the breast of a majority of our people to-day. The idle and poor classes are in the majority in numbers we cannot doubt.

The next point to consider is, the class above want are able to pay a profit, and could well afford to rather than pay by compulsion the heavy tax to support the many charitable institutions, aside from their free contributions to beggars, with which our city is virtually thronged. The poor hav nothing to liv for, while the class above them hav; thus crime increases.

I do not pretend to be understood that a few could adopt better pay to their help and let others grind on for competition; that would be ruinous; yet let the reform commence somewhere. As for instance, let clothes makers raise their wages and after a while lower their profits, then shirt makers, hatters, milliners, and cigar makers, and manufacturers and producers in general do likewise. Make employment somehow for all idle. By this means you will help to break up the cliques and gangs, you naturally lessen the necessity for crime, for building prisons, or branching out in building charitable institutions.

To prove the feasibility of this argument the merchant tailor and shirt maker get higher prices and pay higher wages than do the clothing or shirt manufacturers, and yet in competition so it would work through all trades and labor.

It seems to me the public has no soul or heart except for profit and increase of ways and means and power, or why in this city as elsewhere do people beg, and starve to death, and commit suicide, occurrences of which every daily teems with. Startling developments! the "Fold," asylums, prisons, and all go scot-free until patience ceases to be a virtue or some deserter from the popular side squeals right out; then comes the open public disgrace upon the people and nation.

Is there no one outside of the local inquisitive newspaper reporter to inquire and expose iniquity in all its forms? Is there no one, or rather, ought not every one to make it his or her business to inquire and inform on neighbors starving or the cause for drunkenness or tending towards crime for the sustenance of life's sake. These ideas strike the writer perhaps more forcibly from daily meeting beggars and inquiring the causes, from reading suicides and their causes, from dealing with the merchants and learning of their prosperity with the public, and finding the stations and prisons over full.

Our remedies seem to be worse than the disease if possible. Our prayer-meetings, associations, temperance reforms, and societies may do some one a little good, but we beg to see the general good, the universal feeling, improved.

We can see God out of our reach, or a half dime as far off, but overlook ourselves, our brothers, and our neighbors. We can see foreign missions and foreign projects and enterprises, but cannot see our home subjects—objects for home charity—in short, our disregard for that which would make us wiser and happier and far more prosperous. "Watchman, what of the night?" "Am I my brother's keeper?" "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you."

Fair and Festival.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Knowing the fact that you publish church advertisements for the good of the cause only, we beg the favor that you will publish our announcement on the same liberal terms, and charge the same to Christ, who will, we trust, honor your bill.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Christian people of Humbug Hollow, being about to build a new and better house of worship, and not wishing to provide the funds themselves, hav decided, in order to raise the means to build said house, to hold a grand fair. The committee on attractions hav decided upon the following bill of fare:

Two fish-ponds, well stocked with fish, will be presided over by Miss Sadie Gray and Mrs. J. C. Gushing. Price ten cents.

A post-office will be another feature, under the management of Miss J. Ellen Boldface, Miss L. Maria Daring, and Mrs. Shameless. All letters held for postage, from five to twenty-five cents on each.

The beautiful and accomplished sisters Highflyer, Miss Jennie Shameless, Miss Mary Dareshame, and Miss Sallie Silly will preside at the kissing-blocks. Pious young gentlemen can here hav the pleasure of kissing the most beautiful and accomplished young ladies of our church for the low sum of ten cents. The gentleman's kiss will be returned for fifteen cents additional.

The refreshment table will hav numerous guess cakes, ring cakes, and presentation cakes for those who wish to invest. Miss Mary Amelia Allgush and Miss Jane Jemima Gushhard will introduce young gentlemen to any young lady in the room. Pious young gents should embrace this opportunity to know our leading lights of purity and chastity. Price ten cents.

We shall hav robes, dressing-gowns, pipes, smoking-caps, slippers, pillows, etc., to be disposed of to those having the lucky numbers. Tickets in all these ventures ten to fifty cents each.

We shall hav other prizes to be given by vote to the handsomest young lady of the town and to the plainest one; to the handsomest married lady of the town and to the plainest; to the lady having the darkest eyes and to the one having the lightest; to the most gossiping old maid and to the most meddlesome one; to the most beautiful young man and to the plainest one; to the best-looking married man and to the plainest one; to the biggest fop and to the biggest fool. Votes in all these schemes ten to fifty cents.

Refreshments at all hours at the usual church rates.

Music and comic songs at all hours during refreshments.

Auctions each evening. The single young ladies will be auctioned off to young gentlemen at the close of each evening's entertainment.

Fair every evening this week. Doors opened at 6 o'clock P. M. Admittance fifteen cents. Come one, come all.

The cause is a noble one and grand. The entertainment is chaste, moral, and elevating. The cause of Christ will be strengthened by your presence. Everything is conducted on a Christian basis and for the good of the church. Young men are respectfully invited to this gathering, so much more elevating and moralizing in tone than street entertainments. Come and enjoy the society of our fairest maidens and pass an evening with us which will no doubt afford food for remembrance for many days to come.

Remember also that those who help us help on the glorious cause of Christ. Our work is saving souls, and it is admitted by all divines that no work can be more glorious. Everything with us will be conducted on a Christian basis, and no one article will be sold by us for more than one hundred times more than it costs us. Quick sales and small profits will be our motto. Deacons, runners, and divines admitted free; you too, Mr. Editor. Your presence is therefore respectfully invited to our gathering, accompanied by a well-filled pocket book. If you hav no money by you, borrow some. Money cannot be expended upon a more worthy cause than ours. Once more we say, come one, come all. Per order Committee, JAS. N. ARNOLD.

Liberal League Notes.

I AM much pleased to learn of the organization of a first-class auxiliary League in the city of Detroit, Michigan. I judge by the character of the individuals elected as officers that this League is organized for work. The officers are, President, Professor W. N. Heilmann; Secretary, S. B. McCracken; Treasurer, Benjamin F. Stamm; Councilors, Karl Schmemann, Mrs. C. E. Pierce, Herman Jacobson, and Mrs. L. Barlow. The constitution adopted is an admirable one.

HERETOFORE there has been very little, if anything, done in the state of Louisiana in behalf of the Liberal League movement. But I am glad to announce that the movement has reached and extended into that state. Messrs. Biegel and Benefield, the proprietors of the Maurepas Gazette, published at Pouchatoula, La., write, "Please send us your circulars, platform, etc., for the organization of a Liberal League; we think about organizing one in this place." Mr. G. H. Biegel, of Pouchatoula, has been appointed by the Board of Directors to represent Louisiana on the Executive Committee, and I hope he may be able to giv us a number of Leagues from his state.

THE Paine celebrations this year appear to hav been a success everywhere. The receipts of Col. Ingersoll's address at the Paine celebration in Chicago were nearly two thousand dollars, which amount the Colonel generously and patrioticly contributes towards procuring a statue of Paine for one of the public squares of Chicago.

AT Linesville, Pa., the League of that town held its annual three-days' meeting in honor of Thomas Paine and to advance Liberal principles. The Linesville League has a fine hall, in which the first and second day's meetings were held. On the evening of the 29th the Paine celebration session was held in the Opera House, at which five or six hundred people attended. After the close of the meeting a beautiful supper was provided by the ladies of the League, after which all who chose engaged in a dance. These annual gatherings are under the general supervision of G. W. Baldwin, Esq., President of the League, and others, and are every year becoming more popular with the Liberals of western Pennsylvania.

THE Pennsylvania N. L. L. sub-committe has been constituted as follows: George W. Baldwin, chairman, Linesville; A. B. Bradford, Enon Valley; Joseph York, Meadville; Moses Bishop, Linesville; J. C. Cramer, Pittsburgh. This committee composed of earnest Liberals, I hope, will be able to put the Liberal League movement in motion in that state. There are fifty places where auxiliary Leagues should be formed.

ATTEMPTS are being made to organize Leagues in the following places by the persons hereinafter named: By Mr. J. S. Hosteller, Greene, Iowa; by Mrs. Sallie M. Phillips, Omro, Wisconsin; by J. G. Wood, Pine Falls, Wisconsin; by William B. Green, Varna, Ill.; by Allen Johnson, Dallas, Texas; by W. T. Green, Blooming Grove, Kansas. Mr. W. L. Green writes, "I hav been traveling over a large portion of Kansas and a part of Missouri, and I find Liberals everywhere and by the hundreds."

KERSEY GRAVES writes: "Although not yet in the open field I hav been busy arranging work for the future. I hav got work laid out in nearly every county in the state, but my friends write to me not to come just yet, as the mud is knee deep, and has been for several months. I hav the harness on and ready to trot out when the weather and roads will permit." Those who secure Bro. Graves' services can be assured of a valuable entertainment. No Liberal in this country is better posted on the issues between Liberalism and orthodoxy.

DR. A. B. SPINNEY of Detroit, Mich., informs me that the annual Michigan Liberal Convention is to be held from March 23d to the 29th, inclusive. They are making an effort to obtain the attendance of Col. Ingersoll, and twenty or thirty more of the ablest Liberal speakers of the United States, and the prospects are that it will be one of the most important Liberal gatherings ever held in this country. The Convention will be held in the city of Battle Creek. The large Opera House has been engaged for the occasion. Every Liberal residing within a few hundred miles of the place should attend. Large conventions are the ones that do us good by commanding the attention of the public.

MRS. AMELIA H. COLBY and her friend Mrs. Smith are still doing valiant work for the Liberal cause in western New York. Those who desire their services at any time during the next month can address them at Lockport, N. Y. In a number of places where they hav recently held meetings the organization of a League is contemplated.

THERE is an important work for each of the vice-presidents of the New York State Freethinkers Association to do, and that is to see to it that at each of the polling places in their respective counties some one attend on town meeting day with a petition for the taxation of church property. These town meetings will be coming along soon, and every voter should hav the opportunity to sign a petition. In our large cities this work should be done at the spring elections.

THE Republican State Convention held at Harrisburg, Pa., the 4th inst., passed the following as its fourth resolution, "Fourth—The perfect security of free thought, free speech, and a free press, and of equal rights and privileges to all men everywhere, irrespective of nationality, color, or religion." If we could be sure that the Convention meant what it said in this resolution we would hav reason to be encouraged. But it is something to hav one of the great political parties say so much. Multiply the Liberal Leagues and they will say more.

THE proposed resolution of the Tompkins County League, withdrawing from the National Liberal League, I learn, has been withdrawn, and the action of the League on that question rescinded. H. L. GREEN.

Sinews of War.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We see calls made from time to time by the Executive Committees of the different states for funds with which to carry on the work undertaken by the National Liberal League. So far as Kansas is concerned we know that these calls are almost universally in vain. A few, very few, hav all the labor to accomplish and all the money to pay, and yet Liberalism complains of the injustice of the atoning blood of Jesus as a means of salvation. Jesus suffered in anguish and death, while our few suffer in brain, time, purse, and disappointed hopes that the many may reap the benefits. Bro. Campfield told us at Bismarck last September that he had paid out of his own pocket over fifty dollars, and he has been steadily paying out ever since. Is such, I ask, the justice of Liberalism? If so, then I for one say, Let Messrs. Bundy, Abbot & Cook punch it, and keep punching it with their sharp stick of criticism. If it lacks justice it lacks the first requirement of an advanced system of thought. If Freethought means freebooty on the time, brains, and purse of a few, then Freethought fails to supplant the injustice of the gospel scheme of salvation with a living, abiding truth. Without justice we are as sounding brass, and as brazen-faced as was Lucifer when offering Jesus upon the Mount all of the kingdoms of the earth. Is such the spirit which wins great achievements and hastens the races on to universal freedom? Is this the spirit which actuated our fathers to bleed that we might inherit the boon of imperishable liberty? Is such the spirit that inspired the valiant sons of the free North to march shoulder to shoulder through the miasmic marshes and everglades and forests of the fettered South, that our nation might still liv and enjoy the blessings so nobly won at Lexington, Concord, and Yorktown? No, Liberals, you know it is not. You know that justice is the stanchest plank in the platform of the Liberal League. Then let us stand upon it, and bravely and nobly aspire to do each our respective share in rolling on the ball of human enfranchisement. Let us all contribute, by word, pen, and purse, that the burdens of the few may be lifted, and we enjoy the satisfaction of having done our duty. Life is short and labor abundant for all. Let each League send five dollars to its state League, and then turn in and repeat the dose and continue it every month, until the patient feels able to cope single-handed with the powers that be. Let Bro. Campfield, with his committee, be fully sustained, and the reward will most assuredly come of, "Well done, good and noble servant; enter into the kingdom of everlasting freedom." L. L. RUGGLES.

For Rhode Island Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you allow me to state in your columns that, having been appointed by the National Liberal League, Chairman of the Executive Committee for Rhode Island, I would like all Liberals and others friendly to the League in this state to place themselves in correspondence with me. I trust our friends will let me hear from them, and that soon I can write the cheering announcement that Rhode Island is no longer backward in the cause of progress, reform, and humanity. Yours, JAS. N. ARNOLD,

The Washington Post on Comstock.

Mr. Anthony Comstock occupied the attention of the House Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads yesterday. Under a mistaken impression that he was telling the truth, and consequently acquiring a heritage in the "eternal years of God," he bored the members of the committee for something like two hours with a bombastic and bloviating recital of his distinguished efforts at suppressing vice, omitting any reference to his equally distinguished efforts in procuring false testimony to secure indictments. The committee patiently endured the infliction and complacently listened to the almost self-confessed scoundrel. The members of the committee are, without exception, gentlemen. Gentlemen are frequently compelled, in the transaction of business, to hear the tales of tramps and beggars, and occasionally listen to those whom they know as thieves and rascals. Congressmen are particularly afflicted in that way. They are forced, on account of the positions they occupy, into a quasi association with persons whose filth-bespattered hands many of them would scorn to touch in social intercourse. When the Post reporter entered the room of the committee yesterday, immediately after the adjournment, he noticed a short, stoutly-built man, whose rather brutish countenance was not enhanced in loveliness by a long scar on the left cheek above the bastard blonde whiskers, or by the whitish, hog-like glitter of his eyes, engaged in explaining some documents and pictures to members, who were exhibiting some interest in them. Our reporter craned his head to obtain an official glance at these treasures.

"Who is that?" inquired Comstock, in a stage whisper.

"A Post reporter," replied a member.

It was absolutely ludicrous to observe the haste with which Comstock commenced to grab for his papers and pictures, thereby disastrously cutting into the perusal of some highly interesting "memoirs" by those into whose hands they had fallen.

"I don't wish any reporter of the Post to see those papers," he explained, as he frantically pawed around to gather them in.—Washington Post.

Auxiliary Liberal Leagues.

O. A. Phelps is doing active and good work in Kansas, lecturing and organizing Leagues. He spoke at Cottonwood Falls, Kansas, debating for eight nights in January with Rev. John Taylor, U. P. C., resulting in the formation of League No. 156, T. J. Dean, president, and Frank Holz, secretary. He lectured in Burlington, Kansas, with similar success, a League having been formed with over one hundred members. He has made arrangements at Neosho Falls, Kansas, for a seven nights' debate with Rev. D. P. Mitchell of the M. E. church, with prospects of a League in that place.

Inquiries for instructions as to forming Leagues reach me from many quarters in increasing numbers lately. The work of justice and equity in the matter of church taxation is being pushed with vigor in many states, and has been made a feature of at Albany at this session by Mr. Briggs, one of the State Board of Assessors.

This brightening of the sky will encourage Liberals to go to work in earnest. There is a widespread dread of Madam Grundy throughout the nation, excepting only in a few of the large cities, which hangs like a dark cloud over the minds of both Liberals and church-members, and prevents them from giving a free and honest expression to their real convictions. Merchant Black, for instance, employs Clerk White, and knows him to be honest, capable, and industrious, never failing in any duty, and also knows him to be a Liberal. But so long as nothing occurs to bring the facts to public notice, or so long as it is not spoken of openly nothing occurs to the hurt of Clerk White. A League is formed in the village, Clerk White attends it, and talks in a sensible way about the issues put forward by the National Liberal League platform. At once the church leaders take the alarm, the pastor fulminates, the deacon argues, the members buzz, and merchant Black trembles at the possible loss of trade that may result if he does not take the hint put forward by the Grundian breeze, and Clerk White is discharged.

Now I do not believe that the merchant was in any more than a temporary danger of losing more than the sale of a few dollars' worth of goods, and not sure of that. Customers buy on business principles, and not on a moral basis, and the skies are clearing in this matter, and we shall soon hav less of this bugbear of Madam Grundy's meddling with private opinion. If Deacon Brown changes his trade from Baptist Brother Black's store to Methodist Brother H.'s, for the same reason Class-leader Gray will change from the Methodist to the Baptist trader, and, after all, it might be a good thing on all sides if such changes occurred frequently, not for the sake of prejudice, but for a better knowledge of the general market.

As it is, this domination of the church influence over the active men of society is irksome, galling, and humiliating to noble natures. Will real live men in this free country submit to the yoke much longer? The answer is to be found in organizing Leagues.

THE Californian for February has come to hand, and in point of excellence it is superior to the January number. The contents are more varied, and less space is devoted to fiction. Among the contents are an article on the Solid South from a Southern point of view, an interesting description of Washington Territory—rather carelessly written, for magazine work—an article on the prehistoric relics of this country, a historical chapter from the Modoc war, some account of how gardens grow in California, a reckless and racy bit of good English writing on dancing—in our opinion the best thing in the magazine—and half-a-dozen other prose articles, including two book reviews. There are also three original poems, some short metrical translations from the Dutch, and the usual assortment of "out croppings." The Californian deserves success.

D. M. Bennett to R. B. Hayes.

ALBANY PENITENTIARY, Feb. 10, 1880.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY,
RUTHERFORD B. HAYES,
Dear Sir:

I most respectfully wish to withdraw the urgent prayers that myself, my wife, and over two hundred thousand just and true friends and citizens in all parts of the country hav made to you to release me from a cruel and most unjust imprisonment imposed upon me by an unfair court and a bigoted, unrighteous judge.

I believe you hav the intelligence and legal acumen to know thoroughly well that a gross outrage has been perpetrated upon me in the name of law and because of my religious opinions. I think I am correctly informed that you hav admitted that you considered I hav violated no law.

Yes, sir, I am convinced that, in opposition to your own sense of justice, you hav listened to the misrepresentations of my bitter, intolerant, and persecuting enemies belonging to the church, and you hav preferred to please them to performing a simple act of justice and mercy in opening my prison doors and granting me the liberty to which I am as justly entitled as yourself. Your better nature has been stifled by your decision to obey the behests of the professed but false followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, and this in direct opposition to the positively expressed opinion of several members of your own administration and thousands of intelligent, high-minded people. In this action you hav made a record for yourself which must stand upon the pages of history for ages to come.

I am now in improved health and will undoubtedly be able to endure my incarceration to the end of the sentence so unjustly imposed upon me.

I regret that my wife, my friends, and myself hav ever asked your Excellency for clemency, justice, or mercy, and I again beg to withdraw all such requests. I am respectfully and dutifully yours,

D. M. BENNETT.

Reasons for the New Petition.

First, the monster petition to the President of the United States, signed by more than 200,000 citizens—by far the greatest petition, ever in the history of the world, signed for the pardon of any man—has so far failed. A new and special effort was made early in December backed by physicians' certificates showing the precarious state of health of Mr. Bennett—to hav the President again consider these petitions and grant their prayer if possible. This effort almost succeeded. The pardon was all prepared for the President's signature; but again the Comstock powers, the organized priestly party, now as always stronger than the unorganized Liberal forces, intervened and the pardon is for the present pigeon-holed.

But it does not become Liberals to lie supinely idle under this injustice. We should be continually active, on the alert, and giv the enemies of Mr. Bennett, and of Liberalism generally, enough to do. Since this petition to the President has so far failed, let us try a new petition to Congress, the master of the President, to hav the laws repealed and indemnity paid to those who hav unjustly suffered under them.

Second, this is a new and more Liberal Congress than the last one, to whom the petition of the celebrated 70,000 was sent and sent in vain. There are much more light and knowledge on the general subject before Congress as well as among the people than there were at the time that petition was sent. Increased stringency is sought by the Comstock crowd for these laws, the Postmaster-General has reported and made recommendations of rigorous amendments to them, committees of Congress are discussing them, and the whole subject is up for consideration and debate. Six Congressmen hav recently, of their own motion, sent to Prof. Rawson, chairman of the National Defense Association, for copies of Mr. Wakeman's argument on the constitutionality of these laws. This is a small sign, but a significant one, of the desire for light on the part of our national legislators before committing themselves to further action. On this hint of a desire for information, the National Defense Association at once forwarded Mr. Wakeman's argument to every member of the Congress. A new succession of petitions pouring in upon them just at this juncture would meet a much more ready and respectful consideration than before. If this petition could be made to exceed the famous 70,000 in numbers it would hav many times the influence and effect of that one. If it could be rolled up to the number of 200,000 it would be grand, magnificent, irresistible; and very likely would be successful. There are now 165 Liberal Leagues. Every League ought to obtain a thousand signatures to this petition, some more and some less, but an average of one thousand. Here at the start is a basis of one hundred and sixty thousand. The individual Liberals should make up the other forty thousand or more. More than two hundred thousand can be obtained if the Liberals of the country will it, and take pains to carry their will into execution. Let us do it.

Third. Petitions are an excellent means of educating the people. They excite discussion and inquiry as they circulate. They send the knowledge wider and farther that such injustices are still committed in our so-called Free Republic, and can be committed with impunity. They worry and alarm the church, and stir her up to circulate counter-petitions. That all helps, because it starts discussion in the very quarters where we want it to be set a-going. It helps to loosen the religious ties and show honest church-members the real animus of the priesthood, and of the bigots to whom they are bound. Such petitions also waken sympathy and loosen the political ties which attach adherents to the party enacting these tyrannical laws; in short, these petitions pay as they go in the good results they accomplish, even if Congress paid no attention to them.

The previous petitions were in some instances called in question, and their genuineness impeached. To remove all doubt this time it would be well for every petition to be sworn to and attested by the person circulating it under signature and seal of a notary. Such attestation would put a stop to that calumny.

Every petition should be sent as soon as possible to the Secretary of the National Defense Association, E. B. Foote, Jr., 141 Eighth street. It is very desirable to receive all the petitions here before the 20th of March if our friends will be kind enough to push them and send them here promptly.

It would greatly increase the force and value of the petition if, on the same day of completing and forwarding it to New York, some influential citizen of the place or county where the petition is signed would write to the member of Congress for that district, apprising him that such a petition had been circulated in his district, stating the number of names procured, instancing perhaps some of the prominent ones, and asking his special attention to it when the whole mass of petitions shall be forwarded to Congress. Also, if constituents generally would write to their members of Congress, calling attention to the injustice of these laws, and asking their intervention and vote to procure their repeal, it would all greatly help to develop a public and legislative sentiment against the further enactment of such laws and for the repeal of the old ones. Untiring work as well as eternal vigilance are the price of freedom of the mails and of the press. Labor vincit omnia. Let us see, then, if a little labor won't "vincit" Comstock and his laws.

Falsehood Inherent in Christianity.

The recent developments in the societies of this city—the exposure of the means used by them to further the ends sought, the utterance of Howard Crosby before Comstock's Society, the system of spies used in his own society by one Whitney, chairman of the "Law and Order Committee," with the consent and approval of the famous Chancellor—are all direct outcomes of a system of religion which is false in its foundation and cruel in its result. It is in itself inherently false. It is championed by a crowd of sixty thousand "divines," who, Sunday after Sunday, ascend the pulpit steps, and, with their hands on a book filled with promises which were never fulfilled, retail to their congregations goods they can never deliver, and which they cannot even hand down from the musty shelves for their customers' inspection. For doing this they are paid roundly. By their exhortations and earnest prayers for money they get each year millions of dollars, for which they render no return. Like the bogus brokers of Wall street, they hold out glowing inducements. The bogus broker advertises a fortune for five dollars, but the ministers promise eternal life and a mansion of gold for the paltry price of a year's pew rent. Which is the greater swindler? The broker will sometimes tell you you must take your chances of the market's going down, but the minister guarantees a sure thing. He goes "long" on heaven, and guarantees to deliver at a certain price all the treasures of the celestial kingdom. He knows he cannot get the goods, yet he goes on selling just the same. He is more a swindler than the bogus broker, and should be arrested on common law principles, the same as any other fraud who gets money under false pretenses.

The whole Christian religion is made up of false pretenses. It pretends there is a heaven and pretends there is a hell. It pretends that God is a man, with the failings common to humanity. It pretends that God had a son by a virgin, and pretends that this son is the same, yet different from the father. It pretends that faith in this son will send mankind to the pretended heaven or save them from the pretended hell. But no one ever saw heaven or gazed on hell, and outside of the book which promises but never fulfils there is no knowledge of any one's seeing God. The doctrines of Christianity are unverifiable, and its decrees, from Jesus to Howard Crosby, hav been false. There is no truth in it. Its earliest apostle believed in lying for God's sake, and its latest exponent deceives for righteousness' sake. Which is the best, Paul or Crosby? Paul went among the Romans, and thought it very hard he should be adjudged a sinner because he lied to convert them, and spread the glory of God. Crosby goes among the publicans of this city and lies that he may "pull" their places and confiscate their goods—all for righteousness' sake, and that he may earn his ten thousand a year and get renown among the chief scribes and Pharisees. Crosby is a worthy successor to Paul, and when he dies he will undoubtedly get up a "Prevention" Society in heaven, with himself for president and Paul as vice. They will take Timothy in, too, for he takes a little wine for his stomach's sake, and Crosby takes champagne at dinners, and brandy and ale (the latter he gets direct from the brewery) when sitting in his study preparing his discourses on the "Principles of Deceit," to be delivered before the students of the university of which he is chancellor by the grace of God and for righteousness' sake. Crosby, Paul, and Timothy would be a companionable trio.

The history of the church is a chapter of deceit. It has falsified its own record and the records of everybody else it could. Eusebius began by falsifying Josephus' work. He has been called the father of church liars, but in view of some statements made and principles advocated by a distinguished divine at Comstock's meeting, we are inclined to think the title should be transferred to one of more modern times. If the students of a university not a thousand miles from our office are indoctrinated in these principles, there should be a chair for a "Preceptor of Liars." But we can expect nothing else from a system which takes the hypocrite to its bosom and rewards with heaven such advocates of deceit as Crosby and Loyola, for who doubts that they would be taken to the arms of a Lord who deceived his chosen people as often as did Jehovah?

The ministry of this country is a great organization for the propagation of false doctrines, incredible decrees, and impossible events. It walks into the church and tells what God wants and discloses his plans. Heine says: "The clergy fear God less than other men do. They use him for their own purposes. Like showmen at a fair they exhibit him for money. They extol him with absurd panegyrics, blow a trumpet to glorify him, wear a smart uniform in his honor, and all the time despise in their hearts the poor, credulous, staring mob." If that was true of the German clergy in Heines' day, how much more so is it true now of the American clergy! Every day adds fresh proof of the ignorance of the writers of the Bible, and of their utter incomprehension of the laws which govern the universe. Every day piles up new facts before the door of knowledge. The clergy are not ignorant of this. They are the first to sight the coming danger to their citadel and from the pulpit sound the alarm. The most charitable of the clergy's supporters must admit that they are either dishonest or ignorant. But they are not the latter. Science and theology are in the open court of the world. Science is suing on behalf of truth for a recognition. The ministers are the paid attorneys for the defense. If they lose their case they will be employed no longer. They are aware of the danger and leave no means unused to win. Witnesses are bribed, records falsified, documents altered, the judge is blinded with prejudice, and the jury bulldozed with threats of hell. They hold themselves up as mouthpieces of God, his chosen agents to reveal his will, and they hav got the Rev. Howard Crosby into the witness chair to say that he believes in deceit for righteousness' sake—to destroy his rightful enemy under God. His "rightful enemy" is the Infidel.

The ministers teach as facts things on which the most intelligent hav doubts. We never find the church saying, "We hope this is so," or "We think this is so." It says, "We know this is so, and you must believe it or be damned." Some they find in the Bible and some they conjure up from the fertility of their own brain. Whichever it is, they command us to believe it on pain of eternal torture. The theology of Christianity is thoroughly irrational. It never can be reconciled to known facts. It draws its arguments from beyond the clouds, and depends for its support upon the fears and hopes of the people. It starts from a false foundation, and no conclusion, however learned, can be right that is deduced from a lie. As the order of the Jesuits, in the sixteenth century, possessed themselves of all possible avenues to the public mind, so has the modern society over which Colgate presides. With nearly every minister in the land in sympathy with them, with Howard Crosby, the first open defender of Jesuitical practices, chancellor of the finest university in the city, in complete accord with them; with a member of the society as United States attorney; with a judge on the bench who hesitates at nothing to convict; with a postmaster-general who recommends to Congress whatever the society's sneaking detective recommends to him; with a President in office who has not the courage of his convictions, doing whatever is required of him by the church, it seems as though the ramifications of the Jesuits were complete. As the ancient order put the dagger into the hand of the assassin so does the moral, pecuniary, and official support of these men place the property, liberty, and even life, of heretics in the power of as unscrupulous and bigoted an assassin as ever went forth with the command of Loyola in the recesses of his brain. It has always been the policy of the Catholic church to govern by deceit and dissimulation, intrigue, and crime, but it was not until the year 1880 that the foremost minister of the greatest city in this country openly pronounced in favor of that policy and employed spies to prepare black lists. The next thing in order is for him to make a list of all heretics and prepare measures for their extermination. There is nothing like being systematic,

Howard, in destroying your rightful enemies under God. Having got the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in prison it ought to be easy to get some more to keep him company. Deceit will do it, and you "believe in deceit," you know.

A New Comic Journal.

If any of our readers are in want of a comic journal—of a "cultured" character—we advise them to take the Boston Index, which is edited, we believe, by an ecclesiastical somersault turner dubbed Abbot. We hav not laughed so heartily for a long time as we did on reading that humorous journal of the 12th. The little dog barking at the moon excites our pity, and Abbot snapping at Parton, Bennett, and the Liberal League, for the same reason, calls forth a smile. The first little growl which precedes the weak bark is, "It is a matter of course that the repealers will not relish this issue of the Index." Lord bless you, Francis, what do suppose the repealers care for you or the Index? But

Is relished by the wisest men."

Didn't you know that? If we were rich we would send a copy of your paper to all our friends, just to make them laugh at the impotent malice of defeated envy. As it is, the best we can do is to help along by giving you a free advertisement.

Just think of little Francis Abbot saying this of James Parton:

James Parton wrote to THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 7th: "Here I am again with my monthly pittance, which I trust will find you in good courage. Every week brings new proof of the necessity of standing by Mr. Bennett to the uttermost and to the end. It has become the first duty of an American citizen." Notwithstanding his known character—in fact because of it—Bennett is upheld more desperately and more clamorously than ever by the Freelove horde, as their hero, martyr, and saint; and Parton heads the army of claqueurs. It is perfectly true, though Joseph Cook did say it, that "men are measured by their heroes."

As Comstock, according to previous nnmbers of the Index, is Abbot's hero, what must the measure of Francis be? "Four and a half feet of wretch," as Ingersoll said of Grant Thorburn.

With most ludicrous solemnity this high and mighty comic journal chronicles the change of name of the Liberal League of America to American Liberal Union. All of the eight auxiliaries agree, especially the one at Syracuse, which does not exist, the officers all having resigned some time ago in disgust. This important and stupendous change is sanctioned and commended by the Hon. E. P. Hurlbut, the Rev. W. J. Potter, the Rev. M. J. Savage, the Rev. W. H. Spencer, and the Rev. Robert Collyer. We do not see why he did not ask the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., apostle of Jesuitism, and Anthony Comstock, his hero. There is no doubt but they would hav consented. The Christian Statesman, Abbot's favorite exchange, will undoubtedly assent. So will the Rev. H. W. Beecher, the Rev. Glendenning, Bishop McCoskry, and all the other cultured apostles of pure Christianity.

Regarding the petition which THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes, asking for the repeal of the Comstock law, our comic journal (which we regret is not illustrated) says, "The Freelove ring which at once rules and ruins the National Liberal League has just begun in New York to push a new petition for the repeal of the Postal laws of 1873." It strikes us that this is rich. President Wright rules the League by virtue of his office. Is he a "ring?" We always thought he was a pretty square sort of a man. And until now we never heard that he was a Freelover. Perhaps the epithet he applied to our humorous editor, of "certain malcontent," may hav something to do with the sudden discovery that he is a F. L. And about the "ruin?" Let's see. The National Liberal League of Am—we beg pardon, the American Liberal Union has eight auxiliaries, and one of them dead as Julius Cæsar, with no more prospect of a resurrection than a Second Adventist has of going up to heaven on the day appointed. The National Liberal League has, up to this writing, one hundred and sixty-five, and others forming every week. Does that look like ruin? Has the millstone of repeal dragged them quite under? Has the terrible libertinism of Elizur Wright spoiled it? The other day we received a visit from Julius Reichhelm, of New Jersey, who came into our office, paid his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, left two dollars for the support of the paper, and paid twenty-five dollars for a life membership in the League, remarking that it was the only Liberal organization in the country that gave any evidence of life, or promised to do anything practical for reform. If he had considered the League ruined he would hardly hav done that.

We will once more remind our comic editor that the National Liberal League never voted for repeal. Most of its members are in favor of repeal, but in deference to the sickening sentimentality of certain members the direct vote has been twice laid over by the accommodating majority. And the only reward they hav received for their magnanimity is being lied about by cultured comic editors. We hope the majority will profit by their experience, and at the next convention take Davy Crockett's motto, "Be sure you're right, then go ahead," and blank the sentimentalists. The church is sadly in need of some new recruits of Pharisees, a good many having lately donned the uniform of the various state prisons for little defalcations, and perhaps it will take some Boston editors to its bosom if they send in their applications early. No repealers need apply.

The editor of the comic paper before spoken of wants to get rid of "bad leaders." Hem! The leaders of the League are the Board of Directors. That board consists of Elizur Wright, A. L. Rawson, Courtlandt Palmer, H. L. Green, and Lucy N. Colman. Bad! all of them; very bad! too bad! shocking! "The fact is," says Mr. Abbot, with judicial solemnity, "that the National Liberal League obeys the will of men whose purposes are as vicious and selfish as their policy is ruinous to the League's original objects." That is a pretty heavy charge to bring against a board of directors composed of such people as we hav mentioned, and Abbot ought to either apologize roundly or be sued for libel by the board. Out of our own salary we will contribute five dollars for that purpose if we hav to wear old shoes all winter.

Heretofore we hav had some hopes of the editor who has taken this new flight into the realms of comic journalism, but on reading that "neither the malicious abuse of enemies nor the mistaken expostulations of friends can move us a hair's breadth from this stand," we surrender all our hopes. He is irretrievably gone to the bad and hereafter will prostitute whatever of talent he may hav to the abuse of those who differ from him. Well, good-bye, Francis, we are not going your way. You are altogether "too imperative" and the goal you are seeking altogether "too plain."

The Petitions

We hav had printed on separate sheets and will send them out to any one who will take interest enough in them to get them signed. There ought to be no difficulty in rolling up a petition of thousands within a short time. The public mind is much better informed on this subject now than when the attempt was first made. Seventy thousand were obtained at that time. Twice that number can be easily got now. There is need for active work on the part of friends to constitutional and just laws, as the present Congress has under consideration a more stringent and, if possible, more unconstitutional measure regarding the proper province of our postal department. To defeat this, a large petition is a most valuable aid, and the Liberals of the country are appealed to as the rightful protectors of a government given to us by Liberals. Let us hav at least a hundred thousand names to lay before Congress next month.

Liberal League Notes.

FRIENDS of the League movement, circulate the petitions for the taxation of church property.

MR. S. B. MCCRACKEN, of Detroit, says I made a mistake in giving him the credit of being the organizer of the Liberal League of that city. He says the honor belongs to other persons.

WILLIAM BARNSDALL, of Titusville, is the mayor of that city, and also president of the Titusville Liberal League. He has for many years been a most active Liberal, and known as a friend of the poor and needy. On the evening of February 6th his numerous friends celebrated his seventieth birthday at his pleasant residence in Titusville. The writer was present, and found the occasion a most enjoyable and interesting one.

THE Spiritualists and Liberals of Titusville Pa., held a two-days' meeting in the Universalists' church in that city on the 7th and 8th inst. There were three sessions held each day, with a good attendance. The speakers were O. P. Kellogg, Lyman Howe, Hon. R. S. McCormick, Mrs. H. T. Sterns, and H. L. Green. I was pleased to learn that Mrs. Sterns contemplates working for the Liberal League movement. I am sure she will succeed, for she is an able woman and a fine speaker.

O. A. PHELPS writes, under date of February 9th, from Valley Falls, Kansas: "I am filling a six-night lecture engagement here. There is a flourishing auxiliary League in this town. I shall make an attempt to organize another League in this county soon. I go to Wetmore to-morrow, where I lecture three evenings; hope to organize a League there. I go then to Osage Mission and Altoona, where I am confident of being able to organize two Leagues. Also, at Humboldt, Parsons, and other towns in south Kansas." Bro. Phelps informs me he will soon go to Colorado. I hope our Liberal friends of that territory will see to it that he is kept at work.

THE Titusville Liberal League, which at one time came very near being led into the Abbot fold, I am pleased to know, is now loyal to the true flag, and last week, at the convention held in Titusville, reorganized and made arrangements for holding regular meetings. Many new members hav recently joined the League, and its membership is now about fifty. To my personal knowledge there is a large amount of apeaking talent in the League, and I can see no reason why it should not become an important institution. Colonel Ingersoll will probably lecture there soon.

W. S. BELL writes, February 5th: "D. M. Bennett is the strongest man in the West. The "respectables" will soon find themselves on the decline. Everywhere the popular sentiment is with Bennett. I wish he were out of that vile dungeon. How his foes will dance when he does hav a free lance with them! I am glad to know THE TRUTH SEEKER is increasing in circulation. I know it is increasing in popularity with the people among whom I hav traveled."

FRIEND LELAND is fearful I hav a candidate for the next presidency of the National Liberal League. I hav, but not the one he mentions. I am a "third term" man. Henry Clay, I think, said, "It is better to be right than to be President." I think we hav a man at the head of the League movement who can both be Wright and President at the same time. We must keep him there.

MR. GEO. H. BIEGEL, of Ponchatoula, La., has accepted the position of representative of that state on the National Liberal League Executive Committee, and desires the name of every friend of the Liberal League movement in that state. He is now moving to organize a League in Ponchatoula.

FRIENDS everywhere, press forward in the work of organzation. Before April we should hav two hundred Leagues. And keep up the interest in the old Leagues. If any hav grown cold, meet and reorganize. I shall be pleased to furnish blanks and instructions to any person who may desire to organize a League.

MR. JOHN W. CUSTER, of Hastings, Mich., who has for some time been doing valiant service on the temperance platform, and who is an able man and an eloquent speaker, writes under date of Feb. 13th:

H. L. GREEN, ESQ., Dear Sir: I am now prepared to work for the cause of Liberalism, having for years been working as a public lecturer for temperance and humanity. I write you in hopes you may be able to assist me in getting before the people as a Liberal speaker. I think perhaps I might do something at organizing Liberal Leagues if the society can furnish blanks, etc., for that purpose. Please forward a few to my address and any suggestions you may hav to make.

I am, dear sir, yours for the cause of truth and humanity.
JOHN W. CUSTER.

The Paris Gazette says of Mr. Custer: "Immense meetings hav been held in our halls, churches, and Court House, the great movement having been inaugurated and kept up by Mr. J. W. Custer. Mr. Custer is a pleasant speaker, gets right into the heart of his subject, and carries his hearers forward like magic. He has done a good work in our midst." The Hasting Republican Banner says: "Mr. John W. Custer is and has been, both at home and abroad, one of the most effective temperance speakers this great movement (the Murphy movement) has ever brought out. He is able, earnest, and eloquent as a speaker, and a man of decided ability and sterling integrity." H. L. GREEN.

Childlike Faith.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I went to church last Sunday, something I very seldom do, having long ago outgrown the teachings of the "old, old story" of vicarious atonement, faith in Christ, eternal ruin to all who hav no faith in Christ, etc.

It is said that many orthodox preachers, of late, seldom make any reference to those old dogmas, but preach the practical duties of life mainly, as more in consonance with advanced public sentiment. But I was filled with both pity and amazement at the stultification of himself shown by the preacher to whom I listened last Sunday. His theme was faith in Jesus—childlike faith. He taught that unbelief is the blackest of all crimes, in fact, a greater crime than all others combined and rolled into one great black ball.

Now let us examine this position. Does the science of mind sustain it? No; the faith of a child is the faith of ignorance, is blind credulity, which believes on authority simply, without any reason; which is simplicity, another name for shallowness or foolishness. The nearer to total ignorance, the bigger the fool; the nearer to the child, the nearer to the fool; therefore childlike faith is the faith of the fool, who believes simply on another's say-so, with no test of reason. But faith, whether arrived at by reason or blind, childlike credulity, is in every case involuntary, and therefore has neither merit nor demerit. Faith, in every individual, is according to the force of evidence upon his mind, and not an act of volition; otherwise I might disbelieve the existence of London, Paris, and Constantinople, which is an impossibility at present in my case.

I hav not the orthodox faith in Christ, therefore, according to my teacher in the pulpit last Sunday, I am guiltier than if I had committed murder, treason, theft, and the whole catalogue of crimes all together.

Poor, pitiable preacher—that he is so blinded by infantile prejudices to the perception of what to an unprejudiced mind is a self-evident proposition! F. H. MARSH.

Globe Village, Mass., Jan. 24, 1880.

Look Out, Christians!

The anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine is being celebrated by his followers—the lovers of freedom and the rights of man. It is becoming widespread, and it is prophetic of the certain change from the old, long-hallowed custom of the observance of the birth of Jesus to that of our modern savior and benefactor, Thomas Paine. Then away goes your priestcraft, catechisms, articles of faith, and steeple-houses. And the verdict of the reasoning portion of humanity will be in favor of the disciples of the rights of man, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, as against the Christians, the cruel, persecuting vampires, the bloodthirsty Christians. What a record hav the Christians in contrast with the Infidels! Jesus made the heathen (Samaritan) better than the Jewish priesthood, and the contrast is as wide to-day as then. "By their works shall ye know them." ELIJAH MYRICK.

The Minneapolis Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We hav organized a Liberal League in this city, known as the Minneapolis Liberal League, with the following officers: C. W. Curtis, President; A. M. Greeley, Vice-President; T. S. Curtis, Secretary. We hav eighteen active members, and expect to double that number before spring. Minneapolis has a population of fifty thousand, and fifty-six churches; it is called the "Brooklyn of the West." We hav not yet decided to become an auxiliary to the National Liberal League, but I think the majority are in favor of it.

Yours truly, T. S. CURTIS.

That Awful Paper!

BY PRUDENCE PERIWIG,
(Sister of the Primitive Church persuasion.)

I read in a paper, the other day,
Such awful things! I wouldn't dare say—
Dare say? I wouldn't dare think a thought
Agin what divine revelation has taught.
I found it by chance in the railroad car
When on my way to visit my mar.
'Twas full of scoffin's at sacred things,
The Bible, and hymns that pious souls sings.
And I wondered God's judgments didn't strike them
Ungodly wimmen and blasphemous men.

And it told such lies as made my flesh creep,
About the Lord's shepherds that care for his sheep.
My! the way it went on 'bout ministers! I
Could swear one minnit and the next one cry;
I'd a burned the paper right there on the spot,
But I wanted to show it to Elder Bedott.

One sinner that signed his name "Tee See"
Was anuff sight wuss than the heathen Chinee;
You'd a thought he thought he was mighty cute,
But levity don't right-thinkin' folks suit;
And if I was his comp'ny, and my Christ'n name
Was Barbary, I'd tell him right quick, "For shame!
You awful, wicked, carnal-minded man;
You'r wuss than a barbarous barbarian!"

Even better for you, Barbary, to be
Wed to a half-barbarous heathen Chinee
Than to take for better—which 'ud be for wuss—
This heaven-darin', ungodly cuss.
But I'm a Christian, and must forbear,
And bridle my tongue, lest I should swear.

'Tain't for poor feeble worms of the dust, like me,
To pronounce God's judgments on such as he.
'T'were better to wrassle for him in prayer
Than giv way to my temper and nigh upon swear;
So I'll wrassle for him with all my might,
Though if Clovenfoot gits him 'twill serve him right.

The Apostle John.

Peter, James, and John are the prominent apostles of the gospels; the rest of the twelve are of little or no account—mostly figure-heads to fill up the sacred number. Judas, it is true, cuts a lively figure, but cuts it so short that his influence in propagating Christianity may be set down at zero, if not several degrees below. James number one, the brother of John, runs but a short career, being killed by Herod, if the story of Acts is true; but his namesake takes up the role, and continues on the stage as a star actor for many years. Being suddenly promoted from a supernumerary to principal performer, the play continues without any change in the printed bills.

It is a remarkable fact that the fourth gospel tahes no notice of James, except indirectly in the last chapter, which is manifestly a later addition by another hand, where we read merely that "the sons of Zebidee" were present with other disciples at the sea of Tiberias when a third spiritual manifestation of the risen Jesus took place. O naughty John! Why did you leave out of your gospel all mention of your elder brother, the other "son of thunder?" Why did you ignore the incident about James and yourself wanting to call down fire from heaven to consume a certain village? Why did you omit to tell the wonderful story of the transfiguration which only Peter, James, and yourself were privileged to witness, when you saw the ghost of Moses and Elias, and were ordered to keep mum about the matter till after the resurrection? Couldn't you hav given a better description of that séance than Matthew or Mark, who were not there? And why didn't you explain whether it was James and yourself, as Mark says, or your mother on your behalf, as Matthew says, who petitioned your Master that you two brothers should be allowed to sit on his right and left hand in his kingdom? You were not too modest to speak of yourself as the disciple whom Jesus loved and whom he permitted to lean on his bosom; was it fair or fraternal never to mention even the name of your apostolic brother or a single act that he did? Had you lived so long and become so respectable that you were ashamed of your former pursuit as partner with your brother in the fish business?

No wonder, in view of these remarkable omissions of John's gospel, that it was first to be rejected as spurious by modern critics. It is impossible to recognize in it a truthful history of the ministry of Jesus. But what does its rejection imply? Why, nothing less than that the writer could not hav believed the prior gospel story, whether as related in the synoptics or the various Apocryphal gospels.

With the rejection of the fourth gospel follows that of the three so-called Epistles of John, all of which must be dated as late as A. D. 150, there being no certain trace of them earlier.

But how about the Revelation? That book bears internal evidence of having been written as early as A.D. 68–9, by an Essenian Jew. It may therefore be truly ascribed to a so-called apostle John, though the writer styles himself only a "servant" of Jesus Christ. Assuming that he was the beloved apostle, what reference do we find in his book to his apostolic brethren? He calls upon the "holy apostles and prophets" to rejoice over the fall of the mystic Babylon (xviii, 20)—a supposed allusion to Rome; he praises the Ephesians for detecting false apostles (ii, 2)—a probable reference to Paul; and he speaks of "the twelve apostles of the Lamb" (xxi, 14). Now the word Lamb throughout the Revelation is synonymous with Jesus, Christ, the Lord, and God Almighty; and there is no definite intimation that there ever existed a Jesus, a Christ, a Lord, a God, or a Lamb in human flesh. John's Lamb has seven horns and seven eyes (v, 6); is worshiped by angels, beasts, and elders (11); gets wrathy (vi, 17); wages war and overcomes ten combined kingdoms (xvii, 14); gets married and celebrates the wedding with a grand and godly supper, at which the fowls of heaven are invited to feed on human flesh (xix, 7, 17, 18); lights up the New Jerusalem with his divine presence (xxi, 23); and keeps an account-book (xx, 12).

What trace is there in the book of Revelation of the birth, life, miracles, or teachings of Jesus Christ? What intimation of his martyrdom beyond the vague reference to his being crucified in a great city spiritually called Sodom and Egypt? (xi, 8.) What allusion to any past advent of Christ or to a second coming? He is spoken off as "the first begotten of the dead" (i, 5); but having been "slain from the foundation of the world" (xiii, 8), and being yet alive somewhere in the realms above, it is to be presumed that his resurrection was about as long ago as his death, and that he has yet to make his first appearance to the world. And when he does come he will take vengeance on all save the favored ones who hav washed their robes and made them white in his blood. How, by the way, such a washing can make robes white, is a mystery as inconceivable as that of the divine incarnation. But all of these problems are to be solved when the time comes for the saints to sing,

> Lo! what a glorious sight appears
> To our believing eyes!
> The earth and seas hav passed away,
> And the old rolling skies.

The earliest trace of a historical Apostle John is in Gal., ii, 9, where Paul confers with James, Cephas, and John, and receives from them the right hand of fellowship to preach to the heathen. Paul does not call him an apostle, but one of the "pillars;" it is to be presumed, however, that a pillar-saint in those times stood as high as an apostle.

The next appearance of the name is as the writer of the book of Revelation, who calls himself a "servant" of Jesus. It is possible that Paul's John wrote that book; but if he did, he could not hav written either the fourth gospel or the epistles ascribed to him. The canons of criticism forbid so rash an assumption. Nor could the Revelator hav been a fisherman of Galilee, a brother and partner of James, a companion of Peter, or a disciple of the gospel Jesus.

The next appearance of the name is in Justin's "Dialogue with Trypho," written about A. D. 150, where Justin speaks of John as "one of the disciples of Christ, who prophesied by a Revelation that was made to him that those who believed in our Christ would dwell a thousand years in Jerusalem," (ch. 81.) This is a probable reference to the book of Revelation.

Contemporary with Justin lived Papias, Bishop of Hieropolis, who wrote a book entitled "Exposition of the Lord's Oracles," of which a few fragments are preserved.

Irenæus's own testimony from hearsay concerning John is next to worthless. He says he continued with the church of Ephesus, founded by Paul, until the times of Trajan (A.D. 98. Eus. iii, 23); and that all the elders who were conversant with him in Asia, some of whom saw and heard not only John, but the other epostles also, testify that Jesus was an old man! (Agt. Heresies, ii, 22.) Assuming that John died A.D. 99, Peter and Paul A D. 66, and James A. D. 62, how old must an elder hav been when Irenæus became Bishop of Lyons A. D. 177, to hav been an intelligent hearer of those apostles? One who heard John might be as young as 90, one who heard Peter and Paul about 125, and one who heard James 130 or upwards. Irenæus did not stop to fix the figures when he spun that yarn.

Without stopping to consider various other traditions concerning John, such as his being thrust into a caldron of boiling oil without getting scalded, his being condemned to labor in the mines of Patmos, his horror at meeting the heretic Cerinthus at a bath, and running away lest the bath-house should fall in, and his holding to the Jewish time of celebrating the Easter feast in direct antagonism to the fourth gospel, let us notice a curious millenarian notion he is said to hav received from his Master. Irenæus says that Papias heard John say that Jesus said that

"The days will come in which vines shall grow, each having ten thousand branches, and in each branch ten thousand twigs, and in each twig ten thousand shoots, and in each one of the shoots ten thousand clusters, and on every one of the clusters ten thousand grapes, and every grape when pressed will give 25 metretes of wine" (Agt. Heresies, v, 33).

Now, taking Smith's Bible Dictionary as authority for the value of a metrete, to wit, 8.2-3 gallons, it follows that the product of one millennial grape-vine will make a quantity of wine equal in bulk to the planet Mercury; and allowing to the thousand million of earth's inhabitants enough to keep them constantly intoxicated, say two gallons of wine a day to each one, it would keep them all dead-drunk for the space of thirty thousand million years!

But the most significant statement concerning the Apostle John is by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus. Writing to Victor, bishop of Rome (A. D. 190-202), after speaking of "Philip, one of the twelve apostles, who sleeps at Hieropolis," he says:

"Moreover, John, that rested on the bosom of our Lord, who was a priest that bore the sacerdotal plate, and martyr and teacher, he also rests at Ephesus. (Eus. iii, 31.)

A bishop of Ephesus, A. D. 200, ought to know whereof he writes touching a grave one hundred years old in his own city, and the character of its occupant; and if what he says is true, the Apostle John wore a plate of gold, two fingers broad, reaching from one ear to the other, being the identical badge of Aaron and his priestly successors. It is described in Ex. xxviii, 36, and xxxix, 30, as the "plate of the holy crown," containing the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." The Greek word is petalon, both in Eusebius and Septuagint.

What, then, was John, a Jewish priest of the Essenian sect, like James of Jerusalem, infected with certain peculiar views about Jesus Christ, such as are embodied in the Revelation? The earliest traditions ascribe that book to John the apostle, and there is nothing in it inconsistent with the character of an Essenian priest. The writer consigns to the "synagogue of Satan" those who "say they are Jews and are not, but do lie" (iii, 9), knows nothing of a historical Jesus, but, like pseudo Daniel and Enoch, looks for the coming of a Christos or Son of Man in the clouds of heaven. John the Revelator is no more like John the beloved disciple than Old Hundred is like Auld Lang Syne.

Hewitt on Hard Times.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Washington, the capital of the nation, has a Liberal League club, under whose auspices meetings are held every Sunday. The place is called the Thought Exchange. It is a decided improvement, and has proved a success. Under the name "Liberal League" the people commonly understand the discussion of religion and church matters only, whereas now we discuss these and all other matters in the direction of reform and pertaining to tho welfare of humanity. The Truth Seeker also brings us discussions of different subjects.

The mutual relation of capital and labor has been and is my specialty, hence I desire to quote some remarks of Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, upon this subject, to be found in a paper submitted by him to a church congress held at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 18th day of October, 1878.

It says: "Personal liberty implies equality of rights, and contains the germ of individual property, while justice implies its equitable distribution; and this distribution can only rest upon the axiom, 'To each according to his work.' We are thus brought face to face with the great underlying question whether property is equitably distributed. What are the facts? We find society practically divided into four classes: First, the very rich, who liv without labor upon the proceeds of realized property, with superabundant means, which they are free to employ, whether commendable or censurable. Second, the great middle class, who know neither poverty nor great riches, who are as a rule engaged in useful employments, who hav more or less of the comforts and luxuries of life, and who are above the reach of want. Third, the industrious working classes, who possess little property, but who gain a livelihood for themselves and their families by their daily labor. They may be said to be poor only in the sense that they are liable to be reduced to want by sickness or by the chances of business depriving them of the opportunity to work. Fourth, the paupers, who neither work nor care to work. If the first and fourth classes should cease to exist, humanity would not hav cause to shed many tears. The problem, then, which society finds itself forced to solve is the mode of getting rid of these two extreme classes. The relations of the second and third classes would be readily adjusted. As between them, it is scarcely necessary to discuss the limitations of wealth. But when we come to consider the position of the very rich we are met by the self-evident fact that they possess and control an amount of property which is far beyond the capacity of any class of human beings of the limited number to contribute by their own efforts to the sum total of human wealth. In fact, the present possessors hav rarely accumulated the fortunes which they control. The possession of superfluous fortunes will not stand the test of human justice; and in affirming this I only repeat the conclusions to which the greatest thinkers and the best men who hav ever lived hav invariably been driven. But even if it were not reinforced by such authority, it is in accordance with the whole spirit and temper of the teachings of Christ himself. Increased consumption will necessarily result from the greater intelligence and improved condition of the working classes. It is idle to deny that self-respect usually increases with the possession of property. Property is a humanizing and refining agency. The power of isolated men to resist and overcome the force of custom is very slight. No radical or even appreciable change can be effected except by a union of those who bolieve themselves aggrieved. In other words, the principle of association must be invoked in order to produce any marked departure from prevailing practice."

After citing some cases of organization, he says "These figures make it apparent that a new power has entered into the industrial world which must be recognized. It is also apparent that this power cannot be destroyed by force or violence unless society be destroyed with it. It must be heard. It must be heard. Its just demands must be heeded. This is the voice of reason as well as religion. The points which I hav sought to enforce are that the great question now pending is the equitable ownership of property, and that no ownership which does not conform to the principles of justice will be tolerated by society; that the present distribution of wealth does not conform to the principles of justice; that this progress towards a more equitable distribution must result in the diminution of great fortunes, the improved condition of the poorer classes, and the consequent extinction of pauperism."

In this statement and conclusion I concur, while in many others he states I do not. The more equitable distribution, each according to his work, is unquestionably the great underlying and pending question, which forces us to consider which are the mediums through which now the unjust distribution of property is accomplished. One of the mediums of exchange used to distribute property is money, and with your permission I will in my next letter show, through The Truth Seeker, to what extent our present monetary system effects this question.

Letters from Friends.

LITTLE MEADOWS, PA., Jan. 18, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed three dollars, credit same to Geo. Palmer. Yours until we meet at the gate of St. Peter, where we will hav nothing to do but sit and teeter.

I will then say, in my reckless way, that I will be one, providing there are enough others, to meet D. M. Bennett at the prison when first liberated, and present him with ten dollars. Yours truly, GEO. PALMER.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir and Brother: I find myself somewhat in arrears on my subscription to the best Liberal paper in the world—THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please find inclosed draft for five dollars to pay up arrears, and for its continuance, hoping that I may be better off, financially, when the time paid for expires, for I can never do without the paper. I long for the day when Bro. Bennett shall be out of that Christian prison, and again giving theology sledge-hammer blows. He must never think of leaving the paper so long as his strength shall last. But, Bro. McDonald, I must confess your ability to maintain the standing of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours is no 'prentice hand. Please convey my warmest sympathy to Mrs. Bennett, and the brave old champion when you next see him.

January 3, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please allow me, through the columns of your valuable paper, to introduce a newly-developed Liberalist and lecturer to the lovers of liberty. Through much earnest persuasion Mr. A. N. Somers, of Shrewsbury, Vt., has consented to giv his brilliant and scholarly lectures on Liberal subjects, namely, "The Gods," "Jesus Christ," "Christian Superstitions," "Some Mistakes of Paul." "Some Objections to Christianity," "Hell," "The Devil," "The Inspired Books," "Prayer a Delusion," "The Creed of Christendom," etc., and many other subjects.

Mr. Somers is an accomplished scholar, and has the advantage of a theological education (no ex-reverend), which givs him the inside track on Christian superstitions. He is an eloquent and fearless lecturer. He is now engaged on the third course of lectures at this place, which is evidence enough that he is entertaining as well as instructive. Mr. Somers is no mercenary Liberalist, but a self-sacrificing lover of the truth. Fellow-Liberalists, let us encourage such men. They are just the men we need. Mr. Somers will be at liberty to travel far and near, with a will to do it, after February 10. Will our Liberal Leagues giv Mr. Somers a call? A LIBERALIST.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Your paper is a perfect gem among papers, and in my opinion is continually growing better.

I am sorry for Abbot and Bundy—sorry to think there are such infernal sneaking scoundrels in the universe; but they hav their own reward. I trust from the inmost recesses of my heart that they may never hav to suffer the punishment of getting into the Jew heaven. The angels hav such a habit of going in extreme summer costume in that airy kingdom that it would shock the above-named carcasses to an immeasurable degree.

I inclose you five dollars, for which mark me up another year on your subscription list and send me "The Champions of the Church." I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and while D. M. Bennett livs I want him to be its editor. None hav done so much for liberty as he, and in being sent to prison only proves his devotion to the cause he represents, and is thus more worthy than ever of our aid, sympathy, and hearty co-operation. May THE TRUTH SEEKER go on growing stronger each day, and the cause of freedom rapidly send its truths to the weary everywhere, is the wish of Thine in the cause, ALBERT D. LEECH.

EAST RODMAN, N. Y., Jan. 28, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: You will find inclosed a P. O. order for three dollars to pay for my paper for the present year. As long as you giv us a paper that speaks out plainly, that the human race might be benefited by, I shall remain a subscriber. The success of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to be attributed to its good, plain, common style, which can be understood by the common people. There may be a few who call it coarse on account of its plainness. They may not be wholly to blame in doing so, as they mostly come in contact with the city style, and forget that there is a more numerous class who do not hav the chance of acquiring their high-toned, "consensus-of-the competent" style. And if they would only mind their own affairs, permitting people to read whichever journal that suited them best, and stop their slanderous and ridiculous course, the cause they profess to represent might be pushed forward with greatly accelerated speed, and perhaps acquire the necessary strength to put a check to the domineering spirit of the church before it is too late.

I took the R.-P. Journal for several years, but discontinued it just previous to the death of S. S. Jones. His course of defamation and slander caused me to doubt his honesty, and the end justified me in my opinion. That "touch 'em lightly" paper I never subscribed for, as I did not feel able to spare the time necessary for reference to some standard dictionary that I might understand his allusions or style, which are rather tedious. But it did not require a dictionary to see what was the matter with its editor. "Big head" seems to be a disease that all hav, like the measles, some having it lightly, while others never recover entirely from its effects.

Liberals should be liberal toward each other. We are receiving too many blows below the belt from our orthodox friends to quietly submit to them from pretended Liberals, for those are only pretending who put themselves in as leaders, expecting all to follow them off as a "bell-wether." No, gentlemen, you can go along with the crowd, but if you are very much refined don't show off, or it is very few friends you will make from so independent a crew as are booked on the Liberal ship.

Compare for a moment Bennett's letters with those of Beecher; the former those of a simpleton, the latter those of an old roué. Bennett speaks out squarely as to the facts, and Beecher denies, falsifies, and quibbles. Bennett's is a case of blackmail; Beecher's is a case of free lust, and he is sustained silently, if not openly, by the whole Christian fraternity, right in the face of virtue and decency, while pretended Liberals seem ready and anxious to crush even one having manhood enough to own his fault and ask forgiveness. Shame, gentlemen. How many Liberals, think you, who never did a foolish thing? If all such were hunted up and turned out, how many would be left? Would the eight Leagues and their president remain intact? Gentlemen, the falsehoods and misrepresentations you hav already uttered should sink you to the level of a Christian hypocrite. You show far too much willingness to engender strife among those you should conciliate by setting examples of self-sacrifice; willingly put one side all notions or ambitions wholly personal. If you think the mass coarse don't tell them so, but endeavor to refine and elevate them to your own standard. If they see that you are working for their good they will surely support you. Don't be too quick to show the "cloven foot," that if you cannot rule you will ruin, for you will fail in the last just as ignominiously as you failed in the first.

Liberals are not going to tie themselves up to men or creeds, only so far as principles are concerned, but treat all in a respectable manner, expecting the same treatment in return. If your sympathies are really with the domineering and intolerant church, please just go right over, and you will be thought more of in the future than sowing discord among those whom you profess to act with.

The man who attempts to rule the Liberal element in this country will, in all probability, get his hat crushed down over his eyes, his nose tweaked, and the benefit of a pair of cowhides, and will make a sorry appearance in less time than it takes for a Methodist minister to get acquainted with his female parishioners.

Mr. Editor, keep right on giving heavy blows above the belt to the common enemy, but don't waste too much powder on the snarling, growling sore-heads. They are not worth it. At a close scrimmage just tumble them out of the way by the neck and heels. Keep the main foe in sight. Giv him no time to entrench under the laws of the country. Giv us scientific information, and lots of it. Many of us hav no other means of keeping up with the times, and it also is the best ammunition to use against superstition.

Ye cannot become Liberals unless ye are "born again," which will constitute third birth. First, natural or material; second, into superstition and mythology; third, the mind is emancipated from the second, and reason is enthroned.

Our League meets every two weeks to hear a lecture from some one, which is open for discussion after its delivery. The time is spent profitably as well as pleasantly.

Yours truly, M. E. ROSE.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find $2, the balance I promised to donate to the support of THE TRUTH SEEKER during Mr. Bennett's incarceration.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 27, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: It is with deep feelings of heartfelt sympathy that I address you at this time, and I do feel and try to remember those in bonds as bound with them, and I can truly say you hav hardly been out of my mind since your incarceration.

I look upon you, my friend, as the John Brown of freedom and the champion of free thought, free speech, and a free press, and a hero of the nineteenth century; a martyr to your principles of human rights (which are dear to all people); and by your action you hav shown to the world that you indorse the motto of that noble patriot, Patrick Henry, viz., "Giv me liberty or giv me death." This should be the watchword of every true American to-day. But how few dare to stand up and be counted every time on the unpopular side against the teaching of the church! My friend, hav you realized that your cause is the people's cause, that it concerns the oppressed everywhere? You are, in fact, suffering for us all, and especially for the press; and yet how silent they are all over the land, with a few noble exceptions! If they hav anything to say, it is slander and abuse, and always stand ready to kick a fellow. If he or she happens to make a mistake, down hill they must go. And yet they owe to such self-sacrificing men as yourself the freedom which they enjoy to-day. If the church bigots could hav their way, how long, I ask the editor of the Boston Herald, would you be allowed to print your Sunday paper? This is a question for your consideration.

I am thankful, my friend, that you are getting along so well, and bravely bear your incarceration. You hav not only proved yourself a hero, but also a philosopher. I hope and trust your health may continue to the end, or until your release, which will be, I suppose, when Mrs. President Hayes and her Cabinet (spiritual advisers) so order. In the mean time millions of eyes are watching with deep anxiety, and the people will hold the Executive responsible for this outrage upon an innocent man. The fire has started, and cannot be quenched until justice is satisfied, for the people will be heard by and by in thunder tones, and say to Mr. and Mrs. Hayes, We are masters, and we choose you as our servants; and the power (the people) that makes presidents and executives can also unmake them; and they must beware how they ignore the rights of the people. The right of petition is a sacred right under a people's government; and the largest petition ever recorded in the annals of history has been entirely ignored by the Executive—a direct insult to the people; and still they allow him to hold that high office. I am yours in the cause of humanity,

ANDREWS.

P. S.—Since writing the above I see there is no hope from the Executive, for a new trouble is against you. I think I hear you say, Oh, save me from my friends (or those that should be my friends)! But now is the time to test them, for "a friend in need is a friend indeed," and all others are worthless. I assure you that all true friends will stand by you though the heavens fall. Let every true patriot fall into line and rally around our standard-bearer and support him as never before; cowards and bummers to the rear, where they are always found in time of battle, commanded by Abbot, with Bundy and Comstock as aids. They think they are doing some tall foraging digging up a man's private letters—letters that concerned no one except yourself and wife and the woman in question, and hurt no one except yourself and wife. The woman was not hurt, but benefited; therefore no one has any business to meddle in the matter in the least, and no one but a coward and sneak would so meddle. Just as though no man ever wrote a letter to a woman before! I wonder if Abbot feels very proud of his aids and company, in company with a man who feeds on obscenity, such as nude and smutty pictures and nude forms of lewd females whom he hires to disrobe and exhibit their nude forms to his lascivious gaze until his lecherous eyes are satisfied. This is the kind of men F. E. Abbot is associating with. And yet this same Abbot & Co. are so very nice one would suppose they could not possibly touch anything without kid-gloves and sugar-tongs. Nice men, indeed! Christian men, so very pure—as pure as soap and vaseline can make them.

Step down and out? No, sir; we can't spare you. The people need more just like you—noble, sacrificing everything on the altar of liberty.

Let every Liberal soul come to the rescue and fight it out on this line until justice is accorded to mankind. And I call upon every person with one spark of Liberality about him to cut loose from the old parties. No honest man can afford to vote in either party, for every vote cast is a vote for oppression and against liberty. Let every person insist on justice, and stop supporting the church and all publications that uphold such doctrines as the church advocates, but put your money out for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Commoner, and such papers as are in the interest of humanity. A.

CENTREVILLE, UTAH, Jan. 17, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I see by the tab that my subscription time has expired, and I inclose one dollar towards my subscription, although I hardly know how to spare it, for I get no chance to earn money in this infernal priest-ridden place. But, I want to see the fearless TRUTH SEEKER liv. I admire its tone, with the writers of the interesting and intelligent letters you publish.

I must tell you that friend Abbot sent me one of his infamous copies of scandal-dealing Indexes as a specimen copy, and if Abbot was here I should like to put a few questions to him, and ask him if he styles himself a man of honor, or that Bundy man, in his R.-P. Journal. I saw the simile of those letters in that sheet, and I came to the conclusion that it was a rascally piece of business for a Spiritualistic editor to be engaged in spreading scandal broadcast over the land. I expect there is a large number of true Spiritualists over this broad land that are heartily ashamed of having him in their ranks. I believe, Mr. Bundy, you would make a good Mormon; suppose you and Mr. Abbot and the famous Comstock come to Utah, and try your hands in this infernal Mormon humbug awhile.

Well, Mr. Macdonald, I admire Mr. Bennett's confession; it is manly, though I must admit he acted foolishly. As for Mr. Bennett's stepping down and out because of that frivolous thing, I say, No, it must not be; but stand to your gun—THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let Macdonald help you to fire off some scathing shells into all the hypocritical ranks of the Christian clergy; yes, and all the infernal Christian outfit, with their God and Bible, old Mose, old Dave and his bastard son Sol, and the rest of the mythical humbugs that hav cursed the world in the ages of the past! Is is high time for the inhabitants of this mundane sphere to turn over a new leaf, throw off the damnable burdens of Christianity, and turn our attention to the divine laws and forces of the life giving principles of nature, and try and understand more of her grand laws. I admire the sayings of that noble lady, Mrs. E. D. Slenker; long may she liv to pen her sensible remarks in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sorry I am so situated that I cannot do more for the Liberal cause, but this Mormon humbug is a wily foe to grapple with. I often wish there was some Liberal lecturers here to go through the length and breadth of this priest-ridden territory, lift up their clarion voices and make them ring against these adulterous and law-defying Mormon humbugs. I expect we are going to hav some lively times here shortly; at least, I hope so.

Well, Mr. Macdonald, I hav read a good many letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and most of them I admire; but I must say I do not agree with some of the sayings in regard to Mr. Bundy—about his bald head, and combing his head with a cloth, etc.; all this is wrong. Bundy cannot help being bald-headed. Never throw hints out on a man for that which he cannot help; although he has published a good deal of slander about Mr. Bennett and made use of vile names. But never mind, Bundy will not win the belt; he strikes far too low. Mr. Bennett will, and his paper must liv.

I should like to see some more of the chapters from "The Godly Women of the Bible, by an Ungodly Woman of the Nineteenth Century," published in your paper. I hope you will print it all in pamphlet form. And I hope Mr. Bundy and Abbot, and others that hav slandered Mr. Bennett and displayed their unmanly malignity, will just stop and reflect and ask themselves a few questions, and if they do this I think they will feel asshamed of themselves, for ever jumping upon a man or striking him when he's down.

I hope Mr. Bennett will liv and be healthy, and meet his true wife with a good heart when his time has expired. It is a burning shame and disgrace to the authorities of this mighty nation for Mr. Bennett to be in Albany, but let me say, cheer up, Mr. Bennett, keep a good heart in you. It is showing up what Christian priests would do if they only had the power W. M. WILLIAM.

ABRAHAM, JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 1, 1880.

The ancient a saint; the modern a demon. The verdict of insanity for Freeman, the Bibleite Christian, will hav to be accepted as a verdict no less for their patron saint, "father of the faithful, by whose seed all the nations of the earth shall be blest." See how the Christians treat this "seed" when it chances to crop out—indicted for murder and sent to the insane asylum for being truer than Jewish Abraham, the sainted father who hugged Lazarus so.

No, ancient saints won't bear modernizing. To copy them we become murderers, libertines, slave-masters, mendacious hypocrites, demons, insane, infidels, heretics, having devils, etc.; still all these rightfully claim an honored ancestry under sanction of holy writ.

The clerical checker-players can no longer sweep the board with their lying saints; they must soon resort to their only subterfuge—the double-corner, from which Beecher has just escaped by declaring the Bible fallible—"known to be false in some parts."

All who still adhere to the infallibility of the Bible as a book of authority for all time should read the "Age of Reason," "The Bible of Bibles," subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and attend R. G. Ingersoll's lectures, and I am no prophet if the scales of tradition do not fall from their eyes, and they "behold men as trees walking"—a living, growing, progressive world, full of animated intelligences, instead of the dead sea of odious history, a record of sin, crime, and obscenity, called the "holy word of God"—the God of war, revenge, and rapine—the God that gave Freeman his order. JOSEPH L. SPINNER.

WACONDA, KAN.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The Liberal cause in Kansas is doing well. I begin to think no political party can be elected without us, and that, if things go as lovely as now, we can elect Bob next fall. G. W. CHAPMAN.

FARLEY, IOWA, Feb. 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As the census of the United States is soon to be taken, I hope you and all Liberal editors will earnestly enjoin upon all Liberals in the country to rightly place themselves upon the roll. If this is strictly done, that is, if each Liberal will stand by his honest convictions, and enrol himself or herself accordingly, we shall be able to show such numerical force as to stagger the most zealous orthodox. Please remind your brother editors of this precaution if you think the suggestion good.

I shall want one of Bro. Bennett's books now in course of preparation in the prison cell, and shall send for it when I renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think I can sell one of the same.

I hav accepted the temporary chairmanship of the County Committee of the National Liberal League in and for Dubuque county. I fear that I hav the worst county in the state to handle, but I am going to prepare for a fight two years hence on the taxation of all private property in our state. Our Legislature meets biennially, and is now in session. We hav tried to do something this winter toward secularization, but all we shall be able to accomplish will be an agitation of the question. I am going to appoint a sub-committee in each township in the county where I can find men or women to work. I shall urge the necessity of commencing now to secure names petitioning the Legislature to tax all private property alike. I shall carry a blank book —leather-bound—in my pocket continually for these two years and secure all the names I can. One good worker in each county can, in two years, roll up such a list of names that the law-makers will be compelled to take cognizance of the demand. I shall request each of my appointees to report to me the probable valuation of all ecclesiastical property in his or her township or district.

If each county committee will do the same we will be able to giv an approximate valuation of church property in the state. This I think will help us very materially. We hav a strong orthodox membership to contend with in this state, and the struggle will be a warm one, but I hav no doubt as to our success in the end. The time required must depend largely upon the zeal, perseverance, and unflagging energies of those Liberals who take the work in hand.

I count the days as they roll by, and tally one for the release of my old friend. I write him occasionally to cheer him up, and shall rejoice when he is again free to help us fight our battles.

It would be a source of indescribable joy to know that your subscription list contained a hundred thousand names. Great God! what a power it would wield! Let us work for it with all our might. You can throw your whole weight into it, but we, the subscribers, can only giv the samples of our labor after we hav supported our families. I hav enlisted for life in this cause. It is my pleasure and happiness. My orthodox friends blame me for the course I pursue, but find it much easier to call bad names than to answer sound arguments. H. GILMOUR.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Feb. 8, 1880.

BRO. BENNETT: The Liberal sentiment in this part of Kansas is gradually evolving from under the iron yoke of priestly despotism. Mr. O. A. Phelps visited our city on the 31st of January and the 1st of February. He gave us three lectures in Jarboe's Hall, to large, intelligent audiences. He is a sound, logical reasoner, hurling shot and shell into the old ship of Zion below water line, causing great consternation among the crew, and the captain asleep. Our clerical brother had an invitation to attend and defend his divine institution. We expect on account of their master, J. Christ, enjoying a nap they failed to receive orders to put in an appearance, and let their case go by default.

The fruit of the lectures was the organization of an auxiliary League of sixty charter members. We can recommend Bro. Phelps as a good organizer. He has the faculty of attracting his hearers and not repelling.

Yours respectfully, CHRIS. BROWN.

"A VOICE FROM DREAMLAND."

COMPTON, ILL., Jan. 30, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER because it is so tolerant with its correspondents. I hold its columns very precious; therefore please excuse me for suggesting to correspondents the necessity of digesting, arranging, and condensing their thoughts before transferring them to its columns. To illustrate, my communication of January 3d was an advertisement for two separate jobs of mental labor, containing propositions, with specifications, besides quite an amount of labor thrown in on the first job. It occupies seven inches of column, and I am not much of a correspondent, either. You hav indulged Bro. Audley with twelve inches with which to waste his ammunition by firing at random at my first question without making a point. I cannot see a bullet-hole in the target. I may be so far in dreamland that my mental vision is not clear.

The word God was not in my communication; it has no place in my mental vocabulary. I used the word Father, with its pronoun, five times to express the forces of nature. Bro. Charles has used the word God, Father, with pronoun, forty times, with no benefit to me. Bro. Charles has misjudged his man and failed to see the underlying principles in the question. For the benefit of all I will state them as intelligibly and concisely as I can. Assuming, according to the highest philosophy, that matter and force produce all phenomena, and that phenomena are an ever-efficient chain of cause and effect—each effect, in turn, evolving into cause and producing its sequence—now the question: there is a conception of immortality in the human mind or there is not. If there is, it is abnormal or normal; like the mule, it has no following; but, if natural, it has its sequence. Is the perpetuity of our mental organism that sequence, or is it something else? If the negative can be clearly sustained, it cuts off all reasonable hope of immortality; it ends the chapter. There can be no plea for a new declaration to bring in relative testimony, such as the law of demand and supply, evolution, or any law that exists, for existence can hav no relation with non-existence. I exist.

I would like to discuss the money question on the propositions in my article of January 3d with some hard-money man. Yes, hard; that is the proper word, for I consider our present finance system the greatest curse that was ever designed to bless or blast this nation. Yours, etc.,

J. S. THOMSON.

NUNICA, MICH.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find post-office money order for three dollars, my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav discontinued the R.-P. Journal, and now become a subscriber to your paper. I became disgusted with the course that Bundy took against you in trying to injure your paper without cause or provocation and to assist the bigots in their warfare against you.

I feel very indignant toward Hayes that he allows an innocent man to remain in prison even one day. But be of good cheer; your time is well along, and you will soon be free again. Yours for the truth, WM. M. BRUCE.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send you two dollars for two months' donation to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ.: I renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER with great pleasure, and own that the paper has now become a necessity. I look forward to the publication day with anxiety; and, although I hav no end of newspapers to read, I peruse and reperuse the columns of my favorite paper over and over again.

I sympathize with Mr. and Mrs. Bennett in the persecutions to which they hav been subject; but hope the old adage of a "silver lining to every cloud" may be abundantly verified in their case. I consider the subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER as one of the best ways in which my money has been invested, for the return has been "an hundredfold." Yours for truth, R. H. C.

NEW YORK, Feb. 13, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Albany Penitentiary, N. Y., My Friend: I hav just finished reading your last racy letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is truly unique and matchless in its way; but what I would compliment you more especially upon, and express my hearty approval of, is your masterly denunciation of the late utterances made by Howard Crosby, D.D., etc., before the Young Men's Christian Association. When it comes to that—that one holding his high position in the church gets up before his young brethren and strenuously advocates the using of deceit and fraud for the destruction of those who may differ with him in their opinions—it is high time, I think, for better men, even though they hav no jug-handles attached to their names, to denounce both the man and his method in language forcible and severe. We would naturally suppose, judging from the professions of Christianity, that the utterance of such sentiments would call forth the indignant protest of the Christian community at large; but our experience shows that, as a body, Christians either submit passively and quietly to the promulgation of such sentiments or lend to them their hearty indorsement and approval. Yet, for all, as much as we detest the hypocrisy, perhaps we should not regret the occasion that gives it expression—that lays bare sentiments usually kept so artfully concealed, even though that occasion may take its rise in the false imprisonment of an old man like yourself. This may not sound very consoling to you, my friend, but truth rarely gains much in the world without sacrifice, and you are not the first sufferer for the expression of honest opinions, nor will you be the last, though I must confess I hav never known or read of a bolder or more defiant one. It is the uncovering of just such sentiments as those expressed by the Rev. Crosby that sets mankind to thinking over these matters, and I will venture to assert that the expression advocating deceit and fraud used by him upon the occasion alluded to will be the direct cause of making more Infidels to Christianity as established than all you could hav done for Infidelity by a year's hard labor. So console yourself, my friend, in the thought that if your imprisonment has been of such inestimable value to your opponents as they claim, their steps in unmasking the hidden devil that controls them has also been of inestimable value to your own cause. I think you can well afford to play quits with the malignant reverend on this score. It was the discovery of this veiled hypocrisy in the church which first set myself to thinking earnestly about these matters. I could not harmonize their actions, as a body or individually, with what they professed. The teachings of Jesus of Nazareth appeared to me so incongruous with most that I met with in church circles that it finally drove me from church service, where I had formerly been a regular attendant, and set me to studying and searching for truth as connected with these matters. I am truly thankful, however, to that power which rules that the pressure brought to bear in my case was thus great, for through this cause my eyes were eventually opened and the fetters with which I was bound were removed.

If, in private life, Dr. Crosby is what Mr. Parton calls him, "one of the most amiable and generous of men," it certainly does (as Mr. Parton givs the idea in other words) furnish another notable illustration of how an amiable nature may be transformed into one simply brutal and fiendish by adhering to the monstrous superstitions of the past.

I hav often thought of you in your unjust imprisonment, and though I hav read some things of you since your incarceration, in grief and sorrow, yet there was another side of the case which almost redeemed your error, as it furnished the man occasion to assert or deny his manliness, courage, honesty, and love of truth, and most nobly did you meet these requirements in your frank and manly confession, which has met the hearty approval of your friends. To err is human; to frankly confess and abjure our wrongs is honest, and partakes of the divine. I often contrast, in my mind, your manly confession with the unblushing and persistent denial of a prominent clergyman, the proofs against whom were quite as conclusive as in your own case, and you can rest assured that neither in my mind or that of the public will you suffer by the comparison. But I am trespassing too far, perhaps, upon private and delicate matter, yet believe me if I hav penned anything injudiciously that may cause pain, it has been unintentional, and that I shall stick by you, even though you make mistakes, while I still hav reason to believe you are an honest, truth-loving man, doing what you can to break down superstition and ameliorate the condition of your fellow-men. Hoping in due time to see you again restored to your family and friends in good health and spirits, and with a renewed determination to pursue the cause of truth manfully and unflinchingly, however much you may be despised by the multitude for such a course, I remain, Your friend and well wisher, A. VAN DEUSEN.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., Jan. 29, 1880.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: This is the anniversary of the old hero, martyr, emancipator, Thomas Paine, who, like you, was persecuted, tried, condemned, and imprisoned for opinion's sake—who, like you, has been maligned, slandered, and shamefully abused during all these years, yet to-day he livs in the hearts of the American people—the intellectual monarch of the age. Where are his oppressors? Their names are only remembered with a curse, and their rotten carcasses hav gone back to their native elements, ashamed, I think, of the combination of which they were composed, just where your enemies will go, while the name of D. M. Bennett vibrates lovingly in the souls of a quarter of a million of America's noblest sons and daughters, and the time is not far distant when thrice that number will respond to the anniversary of D. M. Bennett. Though at present our religious and political enemies are fortifying themselves behind a contemplated monarchy, and I seem to see in the near future a mighty struggle for freedom and liberty, yet I liv in the sublime assurance that "ever the right comes uppermost and ever is justice done."

Inclosed find post-office order for $13.50, which please apply according to the inclosed list. Yours truly,

OLIVE K. SMITH.

WHITE ROCK, NEV., Jan. 26, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: The entire Liberal force of White Rock wish me to say to you that they deeply sympathize with you and Mrs. Bennett in your troubles and that they will continue their support to the paper and do all they can to help you and the Liberal cause. Though you did make a mistake in writing those love-letters, if there was anything wrong about it—and it is not any of our business—we forgive you and hope you will be able to continue writing letters for us for a number of years to come. We certainly hav no wish for you to step down and out. I commenced with D. M. Bennett and the first number of his paper, and intend to stay with him and the paper as long as it is published.

I received two copies of the Index with the Bundy-Comstock-Abbot exposé in them. They made no impression against D. M. Bennett and his paper, as expected, but acted quite the reverse.

I hav been a subscriber to the R.-P. Journal for a number of years, but could stand it no longer. Bundy's object in exposing Bennett's letters was so transparent that a child could see through it. I think I can make the subscription price of the Journal do more good by turning it to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Inclosed find $8, to be used as herein directed—$5 for the paper for one year and Paine's Theological and Political Works in one volume, for V. J. Borrette, and $3 for the paper for one year for Charles Brown, White Rock. Put my name down for Bennett's forthcoming book—"Ancient Gods and Ancient Religions." Yours truly,

V. J. BORRETTE.

BOWLING GREEN, MO., Feb. 3, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $5, which I was most anxious to hav forwarded before Christmas, but was not able. I hav ordered the paper for my son, Captain C. W. Hanson, St. Joseph, Michigan. I hav ordered all the books and tracts I hav been able to, although I hav all my housework and sewing to do for my family of four, having the care of two small grandchildren. I hav done chores to raise the most of the five dollars I am not the strongest of those of my age, yet I would be glad if I could get something to do to earn money to purchase several books from you.

My feelings and sympathies for our noble Bennett you will consider more fully expressed by sisters Denton and Wheelock, and brothers Weeks, Thompson, and many more of our noble Liberals. This much I would add, that while I deeply sympathize with our hero, D. M. Bennett, in his contrite humiliation, I still rejoice that that sad experience in his social life reveals to his many readers that he has a large and kind heart as well as powerful and active brain.

I am a lone Infidel Spiritualist here. I do not know one who takes much interest or seems to hav the least realization of the mighty conflict now going on between the powers of light and the powers of darkness. If you consider the contents of this letter worthy of publication, I would like to greet the readers of your paper through its columns. I love to read the letters, and feel very near to all true Liberals regardless of minor opinions. I hope and trust that D. M. Bennett's sad experience in love matters will prompt not only him but all honest reformers to take more fully into consideration the social problem, which is, in my opinion, the question of all questions. Let the fountain be purified, and all the streams of life will be pure.

I do seriously hope Hayes will make haste to improve the golden opportunity to do the just act of releasing Bennett; his allowing him to enter and remain so long in prison is a shame upon his character which time can never obliterate.

Truly yours for justice to all,

MAYBELLE HANSON.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Feb. 5, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I am sorry that it should be necessary for me to hav to request space in your valuable and ever-esteemed paper for the following, when it might otherwise be used for matter of much more general interest; and was it not that my friends, the officers and members of the Liberal League of Utah, are so adversely reflected upon, I do not think that just for my own sake I should attempt to trouble you upon the subject I wish, in as brief a manner as possible, to write, which is in answer to a tirade of abuse which I find in your paper of January 25th, over the name of E. F. Munn (or, as it is there misprinted, E. F. Trum), heaped upon myself, the League, and the Mormons in general.

He terms himself a "poor Liberal;" this comes being near the only truth contained in his letter, for I think a man a poor Liberal who would bring down judgment upon a whole community for the offenses of a few, and, worse still, who would visit the sins of the father upon the children, for this is what I hav always found his disposition to be in whatever referred to the Mormons. And here let me say, and take my chances for being tabooed for the same, that the Mormons, as a people, generally are as honest, industrious, earnest, and well-disposed or intending a set of people as I ever was, or ever expect to be, associated with, and my experience reaches over sixteen years in Utah, and in all about twenty-eight years. There are, and hav been all along, "black sheep" among them, and individuals who hav performed black deeds, for which the whole people hav been blamed. It is also true that leading men, high in office, hav, through religious fanaticism, been induced, and hav induced others, to perform grave and, in some cases, terrible deeds that will always be considered a blot upon the people more or less. And yet the masses are in no way responsible, for they did not know at the time, nor for many years after, that their own people had anything to do with the matter; neither did they then, any more than now, approve of the same. But such deeds as I hav mentioned are not chargeable upon the Mormons only, but hav ever been characteristic of religious fanaticism when unchecked by a counteracting influence.

Now, Mr. Editor, I am no "Mormon-eater," neither am I disposed to punish the innocent for the guilty, but my wish is to giv to every man all the rights that I claim for myself; and, if I understand correctly, we, as a League, are bound not only to respect, but to protect, every man in his strictly religious belief. Perhaps what I hav been saying would do for a "Mormon elder," but I rather think not.

Now for the newspaper part. Mr. Munn says that "not a man in Farmington has been inside a newspaper office or written to any paper in Utah in defense of our respected but much abused friend, D. M. Bennett." Once more the truth, and this is easily explained. In the first place, it would not be consistent for newspapers to publish anything for us; and although the Salt Lake Tribune is called a Liberal paper, we fail to see it in that light. If I understand correctly, it is too much controlled by the Methodists to ever giv us a fair show. I could not but notice how greedy they were to publish the fact of the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett for sending through the mails what it has been thought proper to term obscene literature. It is true, when pressed upon the subject, they (the Tribune) fixed up from Mr. Munn's letter to the paper a very weak statement for Mr. Bennett, but they did not even put Mr. Munn's name to it, neither was Mr. Munn at the time very well pleased over it; and, according to Mr. Munn's own statement, they positively refused to publish D. M. Bennett's letter to editors for fear of the influence it would hav against them.

Another fact I was obliged to notice of the Tribune was the very meager notice they gave of the lecture given by that champion of Freethought, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, in Salt Lake City, on the subject of the "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child." I saw one of their staff there, yet the best notice he got was in the Deseret News, the principal Mormon paper. The Tribune is strictly a "Mormon-eating" paper, and they hav always published with a relish anything Mr. Munn wrote about the Mormons and put his name to it; but it is in no sense a Freethought journal; these are the reasons why we hav not tried to use it; but we hav not been afraid to spend our money in other ways to publish the Liberal League movement.

Mr. Munn's remark about opening our meetings with prayers to Jehovah & Co., I treat with the sneer it deserves. It is true I induced Mr. Munn to join our League soon after it was organized, but he has failed to put in an appearance at any one of our meetings, which, he says, "we hav not been holding," but which we hav been holding every Sunday afternoon all the winter, and to his knowledge, too. It may be that we had hardly yet started when he wrote his letter, but it should be remembered that I had not long returned from my trip to England.

I will notice one more point in Mr. Munn's letter. He says I am afraid of "hurting the Mormons' feelings." In answer, I will say that I hav no wish to hurt any person's feelings unnecessarily. It is no trait of mine to hide my sentiments on any subject, particularly on the subject of Freethought and the Liberal League movement. It is too dear to me to allow me to hide my sentiments on these topics; but I do not propose to insult anybody with them, and here is where Mr. Munn and I differ. And as far as my labor in the Liberal League movement is concerned, it is too well known by you, Mr. Editor, and by those with whom I hav labored and with whom I hav corresponded (Mr. Munn included), for me to need make any reference to it.

Well, Mr. Editor, I will close with an apology to you and your many readers for the space in your paper which this will necessarily occupy, subscribing myself,

Fraternally yours,
WALTER WALKER,
Mem. Ex. Com. N. L. L. and Sec'y. L. L. of Utah.

We, the undersigned, wish to add on behalf of Mr. W. Walker and the members of the Liberal League of Utah our entire approval and indorsement of the above letter of Mr. W. Walker.

H. M. HAIGHT, Pres.,
ALFRED WHARTON, Asst. Sec.,

EUREKA, CAL., Feb. 1. 1880.

MR. MACDONALD: Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find P.O. order for $10; $3 to renew my subscription and the remainder for Mr. Bennett.

I hope that all Liberals may contribute something, according to their means, to remunerate Mr. Bennett, at least to some extent, for his loss of time and the pain and anguish he is suffering for the cause of mental freedom.

I hav always hoped and expected that strong efforts would be made to liberate him from his prison cell before the full term of his sentence expired.

The two blackguards, Bundy and Abbot, hav, no doubt, to some extent ruined his chances. But they need not glut themselves over the victory they hav achieved. I would now rather be in Mr. Bennett's place than in theirs. Time will bring back to him that freedom which justice denies him; but no time can bring back to them the esteem of the public which they hav lost. None but persons of the meanest kind will stoop to the degradation of slandering a man who is unable to defend himself for the time being, and for no other cause than envy. ROBERT GUNTHER.

WYANDOTTE, KAN., Feb. 9, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please find inclosed P. O. order for $3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for current year.

I see some of your correspondents say they "forgive" Mr. Bennett. Forgive what? I see nothing to forgive. He did as he pleased, and that is what we all feel like doing if we can—in our private and personal affairs.

If Mr. Bennett felt like writing those letters to a woman, he did right in doing so, and it should concern no one but himself and the woman. To some, no doubt, it exhibited a weakness in him to write such letters, but those I think hav some lessons of life yet to learn, and as "fools may not speak wisely what wise men may do foolishly," Mr. Abbot should hav kept silent—the awful silence of the tomb. Abbot has sent me his Index several times, marked "sample copy." I returned his last a few days ago with a card. I guess he will not send me any more. I find that those Liberals who are on your subscription list receive "sample copies" of the Index, while some others do not. He seems to hav had access to your books.

I am for Bennett, first, last, and all the time. I believe he is all right, and indorse him up to the present time; and if labor for and success in educating the people and making them free is evidence of greatness, then is he one of America's greatest. The years to come will demonstrate this, and the people of those years will appreciate it.

For truth, J. J. HUGHES.

VICTORIA, B. C., Jan. 28, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find P. O. order for six dollars to balance. I hav long since learned to appreciate its noble efforts to advance the interests of our race, and root out the superstition so firmly planted in the minds of our people by an intolerant priesthood. During my absence I had not seen THE TRUTH SEEKER, nor had I heard of the damnable persecution of its martyr-editor by the meek and lowly wolverenes of your boasted free Christian country. This, of course, made its receipt all the more agreeable and welcome to me. Not that I rejoice in the sufferings of Bro. Bennett. Oh, no. On the contrary, in common with all the Spiritualists and Freethinkers of this country, I sincerely sympathize with him and his family, and, indeed, with all lovers of freedom and fair play; for do we not all suffer by the diabolical treatment meted out to Bro. Bennett by the hypocritical followers of him who said, "If a man smite you on the right cheek turn to him the other also," and trust that he may yet liv many years, to again take the lead in the great fight that is now going on between knowledge and superstition, truth and error, mental liberty and Christian slavery; and that instead of occupying a criminal cell in a Christian bastile, he may rise to that high eminence in the government of his country whence he will be able to mete out that justice and mercy to all classes which he now seeks and which is maliciously withheld from him by a revengeful theocracy, a superstitious people, and a cowardly President; but having so long been deprived of the good things served up in THE TRUTH SEEKER and the embellishments supplied by its many able correspondents, to all of which I had become so firmly attached; it was only natural that I should experience a sensation on again seeing the paper—something like that which it is supposed Bro. Bennett will feel when he escapes from the Albany Inquisition, and is once more permitted to drink in the sweet air of light and liberty. I was going to suggest that it would be a good idea, if it could be done, to liberate him on British soil, where the air is supposed to be exceptionally light and free, but I hav just thought of the case of Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant and will therefore omit the suggestion. Besides, I am reminded that it is a foolish thing for people who liv in glass houses to throw stones; in other words, I was glad, glad to meet and shake hands with my old friend, the friend of humanity, the generous the noble TRUTH SEEKER. If you accuse me of negligence in remitting, I must plead not guilty up to the time of my return to the province. Since that time, guilty, but not wilfully so, and in the future I promise to be more punctual, for while I liv and you manage to keep the Christian's God out of your nation's Constitution I am bound to hav the paper. If you cannot keep him out I shall hav to giv it up, of course, because the Christian's God has always been opposed to the circulation of common-sense literature, and when once in power he will not be long in taking possession of the United States mails, and then dog and his Comstock (they are one and inseparable, I believe, for don't the Bible say, "they shall be no more twain, but one flesh," in cases of that kind) would exercise an eternal vigilance to prevent the circulation and interchange of every advanced thought on theological and scientific subjects.

Having obtained the necessary power, I fear THE TRUTH SEEKER would fall the first victim in the hands of these two worthies, and I would then hav no Bible. I don't know whether I could get along without a Bible. I was brought up in the Methodist church, and am, of course, strongly attached to the good book, which attachment I hav transferred to THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I now rely upon the truths therein contained and the study of the laws of nature, and a compliance therewith, for happiness in this life and my soul's welfare in the life to come.

To go without my Bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, therefore, would be something new to me, and the experiment is one I should not like to be compelled to try.

Another thought has just struck me. I don't suppose dog could do much without his Anthony; and if it would not be considered treason, and I not be laying myself liable to be prosecuted for blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, sedition against the government, or anything of that kind, I would like to suggest that perhaps the better way would be to kill his Anthony, I mean the dog. If this cannot be done, for humanity's sake, try and keep the God idea out of your country's Constitution and preserve our Bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Dr. J. L. York, who has been justly styled the Ingersoll of the West, was here a short time since. He gave a series of Freethought lectures, which were highly appreciated. He spoke feelingly and forcibly in denouncing the diabolical treatment of D. M. Bennett by Christian vampires. He advised all lovers of freedom and fair play to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and, like all sensible men, he takes the proper view of that Abbot-Bundy affair.

By request, I am sending my papers to Alaska. They will be read with avidity during the winter months, and, no doubt, will accomplish much for the cause of truth in that far-off country. May they lead to further subscriptions to the paper.

In conclusion, let me say that I am a British subject, and loyal to all the good institutions of my country; but I think of nothing that could possibly be done here to improve the condition of our people politically, over which I would rejoice more than I would to know that Col. Ingersoll and D. M. Bennett had been elected President and Vice-President of the United States in 1880.

Yours for the truth, SIMEON DUCK.

Liberal News Items.

I HAV heard from several more counties in Iowa since my last was written. Petitions are coming in, and if all the cities and towns in the state had done as well as some hav, we should make a grand showing. But we are getting our people woke up, and that is much.

THE Secular Literary Society at Scranton has taken out a charter. A League has been formed near Harlan, Shelby county. It is composed entirely of farmers, and will be known as the "Farmer's Auxiliary Liberal League." Mr. C. W. Potter has been very active and earnest in the work of organizing this League. That untiring worker, Bro. H. W. Mercer, of Winterset, promises a League at that place as soon as spring opens. W. M. Kennedy, Esq., of Muscatine, writes: "Send us the necessary blanks for the organizing of an auxiliary League, and we will at once be at organization." Mr. Charles Porter, of Grinnell, also sends for blanks. Grinnell is much under church influence, being the seat of Iowa College, a Congregational institution, but Bro. Porter evidently means to beard the lion in his den. Nelson Potter, Esq., of Anamosa, is talking League. These Potters and Porters all seem to be good Liberal people. Let the friends of the cause in each of the towns named render these gentlemen all the assistance possible.

I WOULD say to the Liberals of Scott county that Mrs. M. L. Follet, of LeClaire, has been named as Chairman of the Scott county Committee. She is one of our most enthusiastic and earnest workers. Render her all the assistance you can. The LeClaire Pilot is striking heavy blows for the cause of equal rights, and in its issue of Feb. 7th commenced the publication of Mrs. Follett's novel, "Libra Dawn, or Dawn of Liberty," a sequel to "Cupid's Yokes."

MR. A. L POTTER has been appointed Chairman of the Jackson county Committee. Address him at LaMotte. Without disparaging other good workers, it is no more than just to say that he distributed, with one exception, more petitions than any other person in the state. Let every Liberal of Jackson county at once send Mr. Potter his or her name, and buckle on the armor for work. Several places in Iowa want lectures. Cannot one or more of our speakers take a trip through this state? The harvest is ripe.

QUITE a number of the secular papers here published the petition. Some comment favorably, while others are badly shocked. Many do not even allude to it.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE, a proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, and the taxation of church property, are giving our Solons something to think about and good opportunities for dodging.

WHY did not the Des Moines Liberals form a resident committee to attend to the taxation petition and see that it was treated as its importance deserved in the Legislature? And why did they not at least circulate the petition in Polk county? Has THE TRUTH SEEKER any readers there?

I HEARTILY concur in Bro. Campfield's suggestion that the next Congress of the League should be held at Bismarck Grove. It is a very eligible situation, and Western secularists will extend a most cordial welcome to their Eastern brothers and sisters who shall come to the historic spot to pledge themselves once again to the cause of equal rights and impartial justice. Bismarck Grove (Kan.) by all means.

IOWA Liberals, where shall our State Convention be held? Speak quickly.

THE question of the presidency of the National League seems to be attracting attention at present. Keep the gallant old veteran, Elizur Wright, in that position as long as he will stay there. After Wright comes Wakeman, Pillsbury, Parker, Green, Mrs. Post—any true blue Liberal, one who is staunch "all over" and all through; none of your half-and-half men afraid of Mrs. Grundy. We hav had enough of doubt and hesitancy.

Send for postal petition. E. C. WALKER.
Florence, Iowa.

Freedom of Conscience.

[The following extract, from John S. C. Abbott's history of "The Massacre of St. Bartholomew," published twenty-four years ago, is worthy of a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER:]

There is one truth which this narrative enforces: it is the doctrine of freedom of conscience. It was the denial of this simple truth which deluged France in blood and woe. The recognition of this one sentiment would hav saved for France hundreds of thousands of lives and millions of treasure. Let us take warning; we need it.

Let us emblazon upon our banner the noble words, "Toleration; Perfect Civil and Religious Toleration."

But toleration is not a slave; it is a spirit of light and liberty; it has much to giv, but it has just as much to demand; it bears the olive branch in one hand and the gleaming sword in the other; it says, I grant to you perfect liberty of opinion and of expression, and I demand of you the same.

The American mind is now so roused that it will hav this liberty. And if there are any institutions of religion or of civil law which cannot stand this scrutiny, they are doomed to die. The human mind will move with untrammeled sweep through the whole range of religious doctrine and around the whole circumference and into the very center of political assumption. If the Catholic bishop has a word to say, let him say it. If some one rising in the spirit and power of Martin Luther has a reply to make, let him make it. Those who wish to listen to the one or to the other, let them do so. Those who wish to close their ears, let them hav their way.

But in the sixteenth century it would hav been almost universally regarded impious and rebellious against God to affirm that error (heresy) is not to be pursued and punished The reformers themselves did not advocate the doctrine that a man has a right, unrestrained by human law, to believe what he pleases and to disseminate that belief; they only declared that they were bound to believe the truth; that the views which they cherished were true; and that, therefore, they should be protected in them.

That noble toleration which allows a man to adopt any mode of worship which does not disturb the peace of society, exists as we believe, only in the United States. Even in England Dissenters are excluded from many privileges. Throughout Catholic Europe no religious toleration is recognized. The Emperor Napoleon I., during his reign, established the most perfect freedom of conscience under every government his influence could control. His downfall re-established throughout Europe the dominion of intolerance.

Our country is one; our liberty is national. Let us grant toleration and demand toleration here and everywhere throughout our wide domain; in Maine and in Georgia, amidst the forests of Aroostook, and on the plains of Kansas. Let us grant toleration, perfect and untrammeled, to one and to all; to all religions, to all politics, to all humanities, to the young fanatic in his sleepless dream, and to the old fogy in his dreamless sleep.

Crosby & Co.

BY ALHAZA.

How glorious Christ's temple, from turret to door!
While the humble are mentioned as "only the poor."
But where he is worshiped, if he were a dweller
'Twould be with the rats in the dingy coal cellar.

Mohammedan mosques, too, are small and obscure;
A trifle of gilding is wrought on the door;
But the cloisters around, oh, how snug and how cozy!
Where the poor pilgrim rests if he's weary and dozy.

Now John sells a shoe with the sole nicely glued on,
And Paul a cheap glove, which would hav to be screwed on;
Nor Judas is wanting, the blasphemous jester,
And Crosby can help him to mutter, "Hail, Master!"

"Hail, Master! We love thee; we eat thy good dinners,
But the bill must be footed by credulous sinners,"
They fight fiery battles, and doubting blood gushes,
But the Crosbies are armed, behind sanctified bushes.

Now Gabriel's bugle, how soon 'twill be sounding!
Next, millennial scenes, without weeping or wounding.
The basilisk then to its master will knuckle,
And Crosby will crawl, too, and flatter and chuckle.

But the truth will liv on, every error defying;
No murderer ghastly his master denying;
Though her face is well known, Truth would think it no blame,
Like Christ, to forgive the poor woman of shame.

Whipping-Post in Delaware.

Official whippings are continued regularly at Newcastle, Del., and are considered as a matter of course by the residents. On a recent occasion five convicted thieves were punished, among them a boy of 15. At the first stroke he desperately forced himself loose by pulling his hands out of the staples. A handkerchief was then used to fasten him, but before the prescribed twenty blows were completed he got loose again, and pathetically begged the brutal sheriff not to strike so hard.—Floating paragraph.

Ah! hark, ye gods! what sound is that I hear?
'Tis not the voice of grief, nor hardly pain,
Though caused by pain. "The wind," you say;
'tis false.
I know the wind's each mood by heart; it laughs
It cries, it groans, it whispers, and halloes.
Alike round misery's cot as round a throne.
But no such sound. Hark! once again it falls
Upon my ear—a wail for pity's ear!
And, though suggestive, it I cannot name.
"Imagination?" 'Tis a lie. No sound
Like that was ever bred in fancy's brain.
To justice's, mercy's, pity's state, it first
My senses melts; with madness next I boil
That cause should be devised for such a sound.
If long I hear it, mad in fact I fear
I'll be. Ah! hast thou ears and do not hear?
A human voice it is, and every word
It utters now distinctly I can hear.
That's what I meant. You ask and you heard it?
And you think naught of it? You are a brute,
I think, and worse—uncivilized heathen
In eyes of God, if not by human law.
Look yonder and I'll see from whence it comes,
You say? What! Far down there by Bluehen Bay?
That patch of land "Diamond" some fool hath named,
And blurred the map's pure page with Delaware?
Ah, yes; now I see. There is an open yard;
A post is there with chains from staples hung;
On many links are stains of human blood,
And on the filthy ground it lies in pools;
Over the post a human form is bound—
A boy but fifteen years of age, or less.
Nude is his back, as are the souls of them
Who made it so. A fiend, called man, stands nigh,
And in his hands the flail of "justice" swings,
Each hellish blow, some crime to recompense,
A furrow makes deep in the poor boy's flesh.
Around, a throng of jeering heathen stand.
They're cursed of God; the devil moveth them.
Some petty crime, and he deserves it?" One
Would surely think an angel had been raped
And jealousy was wreaking out its wrath,
A civil punishment—no fiendish scourge—
Is what we deal for crime in Michigan.
Here, where kind mercy hoardeth not her tears
To scald her soul, and pity's aching heart
Is never broken quite; where great men liv
And fiendish scoundrels find it hard to thrive.
Ah, look! Thank heaven, the boy has broken loose!
The crowd will shield him now! They'll not, you say?
True. See, they head him off and force him back
Into the sheriff's clutch, and all for Christ!
May heaven's indignation veil that state
And spell its people who uphold such laws
Until they blot them from their statute books!
And no base cravens left to execute
Such measures—they who now doth feign to bask
In smiles of God, as Moses taught of old!
Such doctrines doth my soul abhor—that he
Is pleased with beastly deeds that good may come.
No God of such a o I know.
It is the devil's v sm ile they heed,
Then libel God by saying it is he.
While every lash that cuts the quivering flesh
Base insult is to all that is divine.
Were possible a hell beyond this life,
What souls its lurid flames would leap for first?
Perverters of God's nature; saying it
Doth correspond to their own narrow minds.
With strife and vengeance rife—not mercy, love.
The sheriff leads him back, as butchers lead
A beef to slay. My heart grows sick, for see!
O hear! he pleads, and they'll not hear his plea!
Ye fates! is there not one broad mind, not one
Warm heart, in all that narrow, snail-paced state?
Not one strong voice to sound a victim's plea?
Shame! shame! that while you kneel in palace thrones,
In worldly pomp and selfish pride, to shrive
Your souls, at yonder stake is humankind,
Save his misfortune, like unto yourselves.
'Tis as the devil pommeling himself.
This may be Christian; righteousness 'tis not.
"Do unto others as ye would," says God.
"That they should do to you;" and this doth bind
In all affairs and deeds of human kind.
Oh, worthy judge! Oh, lucre's prince! would you
For your own children hold this fiendish creed,
And vote a sheriff's public scourge, should they Misstep? Ah, chink of coin doth change the phase
When well-appeared, stern Justice veils her face.
That poor boy's plea, when hope was dead within,
Will sting your ears and probe your frozen hearts
Till death's door opens to your timid knock.
"Oh! sheriff, sheriff, please don't strike so hard!"

The Western Reformer,

A paper to be devoted to the religious, political, and social reform, is to be published monthly at first, at the low price of fifty cents a year. Every person who has the liberty of man, woman, and child at heart, cut this out, attach it to a blank sheet of paper, and send in as many subscribers as they can obtain.

The paper will be a five-column, four-page folio, and be printed in good, clear type.

It will be a foe to superstition, a foe to the national bank system, and all other monopolies that are making the poor poorer and the rich richer.

It will be a friend of the cause of justice, liberty, and truth.

The paper will be issued about the fifteenth of February if a sufficient number of names are sent in to insure its success.

Let some friend in every school district through the West act as an agent, and send in the names without delay. Money to be paid on receipt of first paper. Address S. Paris Davis, Salina, Kansas.

Revelations of Antichrist

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read.

ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Repha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. ## "SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that have been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You have done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to have answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to have met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Kelm, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

To bear is to conquer our fate.—Campbell.

Never does time travel faster
Than when his way lies among flowers.—Moyer

GIV me the storm and tempest of thought and action rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith. Banish me from Eden when you will, but first let me eat of the fruit of the tree of life.—Ingersoll.

WHEN all is done, human life is, at the greatest and the best, but like a forward child that must be played with and humored a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the care is over.—Sir Wm. Temple.

SIR, I am a true laborer; I earn that I eat, get that I wear, owe no man hate, envy no man happiness, glad of other men's good, content with my farm, and the greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze and my lambs suck.—Shakspere.

FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies—
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand.
Little flower, but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I could know what God and man is.
—Tennyson.

THE old idea of inflicted punishment and torment of soul and body in hell-fire hardly finds an intelligent supporter in the modern pulpit; but the solemn and awful truth behind the metaphor—the truth that, in all stages of being, men must take the consequences of conduct and pass for what they are—is taking its rightful place in all systems of religious thought.—Christian Register.

WE do not say that we hav discovered all—that our doctrines are all in all of truth. We know no end to the development of man. We cannot unravel the infinite complications of matter and force. The history of one monad is as unknown as the universe; one drop of water is as wonderful as all the seas; one leaf as all the forests; one grain of sand as all the stars.—Ingersoll.

THE uncles of Hugh Miller were highly cultivated men, reading the best books, concerning one of whom he remarks: "There are professors of natural history who know less of living nature than was known by Uncle Sandy, and yet one of them was a harness-maker, and the other a stone-mason, each laboring industriously at his calling for daily bread six days in the week.—Dr. Francis Wayland.

I NEVER could discern in him (Shelley) any more than two fixed principles. The first was a strong irrepressible love of liberty. . . The second was equally ardent love of toleration of all opinions, but more especially of religious opinions; of toleration, complete, entire, universal, unlimited; and, as a deduction and corollary from which latter principle, he felt an intense abhorrence of persecution of every kind, public or private.—Hogg.

THIS is precisely the difference between science and prejudice, that the latter keeps stubbornly to its position, whether disproved or not, whilst the former is an unarrestable movement towards the fountain of truth, caring little for cherished authorities or sentiments, but continually progressing, feeling no false shame at her shortcomings, but, on the contrary, the highest pleasure, when freed from an error, at having advanced another step toward the attainment of divine truth, a pleasure not even intelligible to the pride of ignorance.—Prince Albert.

I TAKE a handful of dirt in my hands, and into that dust I put seeds, and arrows from the eternal quiver [Homeric] of the sun smite it, and the seeds grow and bud and blossom and fill the air with perfume in my sight. Do you understand that? Do you understand how this dust and these seeds and that light and this moisture produced that bud and that flower and that perfume? Do you understand that any better than you do the production of thought? Do you understand that more than you do the thoughts of love that you see in the eyes of the one you adore? Can you explain it? Can you tell what matter is? You hav not the slightest conception.—Ingersoll.

THE Christian just as firmly believes in his imaginary, ideal God as the old pagan and savage nations believed in the deific powers of snakes, frogs, crocodiles, leeks, onions, etc. An animal god, a vegetable god, or a stone idol is just as powerful as a thought god. I can believe in the ruling and creative power of one sort just as easily as in the other. I assure Christians I am as much in sober, solemn earnest in all I say as they can possibly be. I want truth and I want others to hav it; I want happiness and want others to hav it, and I think I am on the road to both, while they are off in a dark, dismal by-way, illumined now and then by a will-o'-the-wisp of faith or a dream of some illusive phantom they think divine.—E. D. Slenker.

WHO are the great?
They who hav boldly ventured to explore
Unsounded seas and lands unknown before;
Soared on the wings of science, wide and far,
Measured the sun and weighed each distant star;
Pierced the dark depths of ocean and of earth,
And brought uncounted wonders into birth;
Repelled the pestilence, restrained the storm,
And given new beauty to the human form;
Wakened the voice of reason, and unfurled
The page of truthful knowledge to the world;
They who hav toiled and studied for mankind,
Around each slumbering faculty of mind,
Taught us a thousand blessings to create.
These are the nobly great!
—J. Critchley Prince.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petition is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibiy directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

Oh, banded with pansy and curtained with white,
Yellow with gold from the sunset sky,
Laced with the shadelets of latticing light,
Silken and soft as a vanishing sigh—
Oh, what can you say of a bonnet, doggonit,
When writing a sonnet upon it?

A LITTLE pair of gloves that yet
Retain the smell of clover,
And just a tinge of mignonette—
I turn them vaguely over.
And marvel how the girl I kissed
The night she promised to be true
Could jam a number seven fist
Into a paltry number two.

A GENTLEMAN living in the northern part of the county has been so unfortunate as to hav lost five excellent wives. He lately determined to erect a tombstone at the head of each, commemorating her virtues, and has only been deterred from so doing by the expense attending the carrying out of the design. Yesterday he came to the city, a happy thought having struck him, and arranged for the tombstone. The five wives were buried side by side in the same grave-yard. This was the happy thought: The Christian name of each wife to be on a small stone—"Emma," "Jane," "Margaret," "Mary," "Elizabeth"—a hand, cut on each stone, pointing to a large stone in the center of the lot, and under each hand, "For epitaph see large stone."

THE MUDDY CROSSING.

Just over there at the window,
Hidden behind the shade,
Sits a wicked man with his paper
Watching a poor little maid.

Smiling he watches her coming
Pattering down the street,
Daintily buttoned gaiters
Hiding her charming feet.

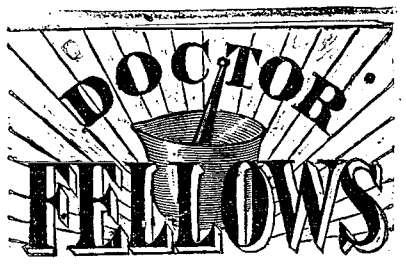
She reaches the muddy crossing,
And pauses there in dismay,
While that wicked, wicked mortal
Watches from over the way.

Laughing to see the maiden
Look at the muddy street,
Then smiling at her vexation
As she glances down at her feet.

Bravely she gathers her flounces,
Raises her skirts up high—
What is it that man at the window
With glistening eyes doth spy?

Under the snowy ruffles
Gleaming out so bright
A pair of striped stockings
Are gradually gaining sight.

Then, as the mud grows deeper,
The maiden stops in dismay,
Unveiling still more of the stockings
To that creature over the way.



With her skirts uplifted bravely,
Higher and yet more high,
A daintily buckled garter
Sparkles upon the eye.

Oh! man over there at the window,
Don't stare so hard, I pray,
At that helpless little maiden
Crossing the muddy way.

But he dashes down the paper,
And throws aside the shade,
Gazing still more intently
Right at the poor little maid.

Now she has turned a corner
And vanished out of sight,
While that wicked mortal yonder
Watches another wight.

The golden summer sunshine
Is all very well in its way,
But mud and striped stockings are nicer
To that man across the way.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus "let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours. JAMES PARTON.

Then pray and vote for speedy relief, and it will surely come.—Le Claire Pilot.

A RELIGIOUS journal of Como, the Oderie, says that the Pope has excommunicated M. Leo Taxil, a French writer well known for his ultra-radical opinions. The sentence is grounded on the publication of a work in which M. Taxil "vehemently attacks several dogmas affirmed by the councils and denies the divine mysteries which form the basis of the Catholic religion." M. Taxil has sent his book to the holy Father with the following dedication: "To M. Pecci, called Leo, No. 13, with most sincere wishes for the early and definite downfall of the papacy. From Leo Taxil, baptized in spite of himself."

IN his message to the legislature, Governor Cornell, of New York, recommended that women should be made eligible for election as school trustees. The Legislature has passed a bill—in the Senate unanimously, and in the House with but three dissenters—not only making women eligible for such offices, but voters for them. The Governor has signed the bill, and thus a very important step forward has been taken. The great majority of teachers in the schools are women, and as mothers women hav the same interest as fathers in the education of their children, while their care of the details of the education of girls is peculiarly fitting.

A. J. KIRK, an ordained minister of the United Brethren denomination, was arrested in Kansas city on the 7th on a telegram from Ottawa, Kansas. He was formerly a pastor there, and is charged with swindling, seduction, and wife desertion. The second charge does not seem to be so well sustained as the rest, although there are strong rumors of his having dallied with some of the lambs of his flock. The other charges are understood to be well proved. Kirk fled from Ottawa December 23d, and has since done laboring work in Kansas City. He kept his whereabouts unknown until Saturday, when he was discovered by means of a letter which he had sent to his wife. He is married to a girl of very respectable parentage, but he has failed to support her.

WHEN the pious shepherd Cowley wasn't praying,
Wasn't praying,
He loved to beat his "lambs" upon the head,
'Pon the head;
When the winter winds were round his "Fold" a-playing,
Fold a-playing,
He lodged them with one sheet for every bed,
Every bed;
When with aching fist he could no longer pound them,
Longer pound them,
The cat-o'-nine-tails caused a powerful sting,
Powerful sting,
Oh, take things generally as it found them,
As it found them,
Life at the "Fold" was not a happy thing.

PROCTOR KNOTT has a happy way of putting things when he tries. In a speech the other day in Congress he used language that neatly describes the rage for corporate societies, which has brought into existence that variety of virtuous organizations of which Comstock, Crosby, Whitney, and Gerry are apostles. He said: "The rage for corporate privileges has become so prevalent that the Young Men's Christian Association can scarcely hold a prayer-meeting without an act of Congress or a charter from a state legislature, authorizing them to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded. Turn which way we will, we are confronted by these ideal entities, these incorporeal, intangible faculties, these viewless, bloodless, soulless beings whom an Omnipotent God never created, and for whom there is no provision in the plan of salvation."

THE other day a well-edited daily paper spoke of "the Society for the Prevention of Crime to Children." It was a pardonable mistake. There are so many societies for the prevention of this, that, and the other thing, that the effect is confusing. This is clearly unnecessary. And all are endowed with extraordinary powers by special local legislation. That is clearly bad. The other day Mr. Anthony Comstock announced that he had the right to entrap any suspected person into compromising admissions before arresting him. And yet our laws protect all persons accused of crime from such treatment at the hands of the regular officers of the law. Why is Mr. Anthony Comstock superior to all rules of legal right and propriety? Supposing that Mr. Anthony Comstock is a perfectly honest and able man—the best man in the world for such a position—can the commonwealth afford to set aside its whole code of criminal procedure in favor of any one man? —Puck.

THE Emperor Julian's conception of Christianity was that it was a sheer contrivance, a kind of mutual benefit society set up solely in the interests of the managers. He found so much hypocrisy among Christians that he assumed it of them all. St. John's attribution of divinity to Christ he regards as a clever fraud: the whole fabric of sacerdotalism was ingenious mechanism; the clergy were ambitious schemers; if deprived of the power to tyrannize and dictate and appropriate other men's goods, they at once became centers of faction, professional incendiaries, whose work it was to inflame party against party in their own selfish interests. The monks were no better; self-renunciation was a sham. To him, almsgiving and charities were but ingenious devices to support the ascendency of a ruling caste. He compares the Christians to kidnappers who tempt children by mouthfuls of cake, and finally catch them and fling them into confinement, to spend a life of misery as the cost of the transient sweet that tickled their palate for the nonce. If pagans did but imitate the cunning of the Christians on more magnamimous motives, they would soon occupy the same position of influence.

THE following is a case of unrewarded enterprise: A few Sunday evenings since a newspaper man in this city found himself a spectator in a meeting for prayer and conference. How it came about it is not worth while to inquire, but there he was. He didn't take very much interest in the proceedings until a young man, who was trying to impress upon the minds of his unconverted hearers the importance of seeking Christ at once, as "now is the accepted time," remarked in the course of an earnest exhortation: "Only to-day a very particular friend of mine was taken away—struck down in the prime of life and in full vigor—dropped dead in the street." This attracted the attention of the newspaper man, and straightway he had his eye out for business. Here was evidently an item of interest, so he waited until the benediction was pronounced, when he approached the fervent young exhorter and modestly inquired the name of the friend of whom he had spoken. The young Christian made some evasive answer, whereupon the newspaper man said: "I am a newspaper man, and I thought the facts in the case would be of interest to our readers; will you giv me his name and when it happened?" The exhorter again made an evasive reply, whereupon the newspaper man remarked: "Oh, I see! you only used it as an illustration;" and shutting up his note-book he went away sorrowful.

INO AND UNO.

Ino and Uno are two little boys
Who always are ready to fight,
Because each will boast
That he knows the most
And the other one cannot be right.

Ino and Uno went into the woods,
Quite certain of knowing the way;
"I am right! you are wrong!"
They said, going along,
And they didn't get out till next day.

Ino and Uno rose up with the lark,
To angle awhile in the brook,
But by contrary signs
They entangled their lines,
And brought nothing home to cook!

Ino and Uno went out on the lake,
And oh! they got dreadfully wet!
While discussion prevailed
They carelessly sailed
And the boat they were in was upset!

Though each is entitled opinions to hav,
They need not be foolishly strong;
And to quarrel and fight
Over what we think right
Is, you know and I know, quite wrong!

DURING the past few weeks a very unladylike epidemic has broken out among the servant girls. Hardly a day passes but that one of them, heretofore carrying a spotless reputation, is caught kissing a preacher. It seems strange that a servant girl cannot know her place, and attend properly to the household duties intrusted to her care, without neglecting her work to take liberties with unprotected preachers staying about the house alone. A servant who would deliberately take advantage of an innocent pastor should be utterly tabooed by the employment agencies and compelled to find her level. A minister of the gospel, earnestly endeavoring to follow out the samifications of the plan of salvations, is entitled to be protected in his own house, which is rightfully his castle. The hired help seem to be getting so emboldened by success that no divine is safe if his wife happens to walk out for a few moments. It is high time that some law were passed in all the states clearly defining the duties of servants and fixing penalties for overstepping the bounds of modesty. A preacher has scarcely any show when once in the clutches of a bold, bad servant girl, who cares little for her own character and ignores the fact that she is sapping the foundation of religion and attacking the bulwarks which hav surrounded the Christian faith for ages. The servant girl should be suppressed, even if it takes an amendment to the Constitution to bring about the necessary reform. In a crisis like this the church needs the strong arm of a great government to protect it.

Materialism and Crime.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

It is now conceded by all intelligent critics and opponents of his philosophy that Epicurus was personally one of the purest men of antiquity, that he was a model of temperance and simplicity, that he dwelt with his disciples in his famous garden in the purest fellowship, and died at an advanced age in the midst of his circle of followers and friends, honored and beloved for his wisdom and his serene and beautiful life. He taught that "virtue is the only permanent element of pleasure," that "man cannot be happy unless he is wise, noble, and just; and conversely, that man cannot be wise, noble, and just without being really happy." It was the moral beauty and simplicity of his philosophy that attracted to it the Roman Lucretius, who, amidst the confusion and turbulence of civil war, "sought some stay for his inner life, and found it in the philosophy of Epicurus," in defense and exposition of which he gave to the world one of the grandest didactic poems of classical antiquity.

Yet Epicurus, even while living, was misunderstood, misrepresented, and maligned; and after his death fresh calumnies were added to old ones, and industriously circulated to blacken his memory and destroy his influence. The multitude were made to believe that he was a slave of his lusts, who, to make his theory consistent with his practice, actually advocated gluttony, intemperance, and sensuality as the highest virtues. Thus envy, ignorance, and religious bigotry combined to represent him as a monster of depravity, and his name became proverbialized for every species of indulgence and excess.

Epicureanism having become confounded with license and libertinism, there were not a few who professed to accept the philosophy, modifying it to make it conform to their superficial theories and loose morals, but still retaining the name to give to their notions the dignity and importance of a philosophic system which should justify the lives they lived.

"The Romans," says Lange, in his thorough and impartial "History of Materialism," "had become practical Materialists, often in the very worst sense of the term, before they had yet learned the theory. The theory of Epicurus was, however, in every way purer and nobler than the practice of these Romans; and so now two courses were open to them; they either allowed themselves to be purified and became modest and temperate, or they corrupted the theory, and so combined the conception of its friends and foes that they ended by having a theory of Epicureanism which corresponded to their habits" (Vol. i, p. 128).

These facts pertaining to Epicurus, indicating the character of the opposition his teachings have had to encounter, have been brought to mind on reading in a recent number of the New York Post an editorial article, headed "Materialism and Crime," in which the writer, with an utter disregard of truth, makes an assault on a philosophic system of which apparently he knows nothing, indulging in the same kind of misrepresentation, and employing the same means to arouse prejudice and resentment against an unpopular system that were used against Epicurus and his teachings more than two thousand years ago. The writer says, "We believe it to be susceptible of demonstration that the late extraordinary and deplorable increase of crime" "is largely due to the growth of Materialism, or what is termed Infidelity." "The fruit of unbelief among the upper or wealthy classes is sensuality. Those classes get to worship, instead of their maker, the pleasures of the moment. They bow down to rich food and fine clothes and enervating amusements. They make goddesses of women who possess mere physical beauty. Their hearts are set on yachts and race-courses and theaters and operas." "One after another the commandments are broken as they stand in the way of desire, and a shameless ruin is left at last in the place of what might have been a perfect temple; a shattered and sated voluptuary in place of a nobly-perfected human being. Among the poorer and less educated ranks of society, the cant and poison of living only for the day is even more directly disastrous. The rich can gratify their passions without, as a rule, and in the legal sense, coming in contact with the rights of others. But the needy, unrestrained by any fear of future account, and thinking only to eat and drink, since to-morrow they die, drive straight on to crime. That this is no idle assertion can be abundantly proved. A careful survey of the murders, suicides, and other great felonies committed in the chief cities of the United States during the last ten years, shows that a heavy fraction of the perpetrators were Atheists or Freethinkers. These unhappy persons, persuaded that life is the be-all and end-all here, imagine that in their calculations they can jump the life to come. A collection of the letters or other papers left by criminals when anticipating death shows a fearful number of instances, some of which many readers will recall, of absolute disbelief in the existence of a God or in any reckoning for wrong done in this life to be exacted in a future one." "Has experience shown, and especially in those annals of crime we have taken occasion to discuss, that there is any better conservator of society than the simple piety of our grandfathers?"

Observe here that Materialism as a system of thought which is confined to a comparatively small number of minds, which has no attraction for the masses, and is the philosophy of but a small proportion of Infidels even, which is a subject of no interest whatever to the worshipers of fashion, to mere pleasure-seekers, to political demagogues, or those whose energies are wholly employed in the scramble for wealth, is confounded with that so-called "practical Materialism" which is more commonly found in every country among the adherents of the popular faith than among those who reject that faith and attach themselves to a hated reform or adopt an unpopular theory. "Persons who worship nothing but worldly success, who care for nothing but wealth or fashionable display or personal celebrity or sensual gratification," says Fiske, "are loosely called Materialists. The term can therefore easily be made to serve as a poisoned weapon, and there are theologians who do not scruple to employ it as such against the upholders of philosophic opinions which they do not like, but are unable to refute. A most flagrant instance was recently afforded by a lecturer on Positivism, who, after insinuating that pretty much the whole body of contemporary scientific philosophers are Positivists, and that Positivists are but very little better than Materialists, proceeded to inform his audience that Materialists are men who lead licentious lives" (Cosmic Philosophy, Vol. ii, p. 433).

Let the editor of the Post, by an appeal to history or by a reference to the facts of the present day, show, if he can, that philosophical Materialism leads to vice and crime, instead of joining the theologian in confounding it with sensualism, and ascribing to it evils which are found in the greatest magnitude and to the most alarming extent where Materialism is the least known, and where it has exerted the least influence. He will find, as Lange says, "that the sober earnest which marks the great Materialistic system of antiquity is perhaps more suited than an enthusiastic idealism, which only too easily results in its own bewilderment, to keep the soul clear of all that is low and vulgar, and to lend it a lasting effort after worthy objects" (History of Materialism, p. 47); and that "in the centuries when the abominations of a Nero, a Caligula, or even of a Heliogabalus, polluted the globe, no philosophy was more neglected, none was more foreign to the spirit of the time, than that of all which demanded the coldest blood, the calmest contemplation, the most sober and purely prosaic inquiry, the philosophy of Democritus and Epicurus" (p. 167). If this editor will extend his observation and acquaintance to the lives and character of Materialists of to-day, he will find them thoughtful, earnest men and women, possessing generally marked individuality, indifferent to the fashionable pleasures of society, and devoted to reformatory movements of the times. So long as editors of influential journals will unite with the clergy in giving the name Materialism to anything and everything that is objectionable and odious, so long will be included in its ranks, nominally, thousands, including unworthy and immoral persons, who really know nothing about Materialism, and whose characters are more the result of the religious faith in which they were brought up than of a philosophy of which they are totally ignorant.

If the increase of crime and vice is largely due to "Materialism, or what is termed Infidelity," the pious editor of the Post should not be backward in making known to the world the evidence on which this statement is founded. The mere fact that among the wealthy classes sensuality prevails, and that there is a desire for rich food and fine clothes and enervating amusements, for yachts and race-courses, and theaters and operas and beautiful women, will hardly be accepted as proof that these classes are under the influence of Materialism or of Infidelity. If the desire for these things were confined to Materialists and Infidels, and it were certain that they are all indications of depravity and wickedness, they might be referred to to sustain the position taken; but when it is undeniable that "the good things of this world," including those of questionable propriety, are enjoyed by Christians with quite as much zest as they are by unbelievers, it is hardly fair to mention them as proof that Infidelity is corrupting society.

That those "among the poorer and less educated ranks of society, "who drive straight on to crime," are Materialists or Infidels, that a "heavy fraction" of the murders, suicides, and other great felonies committed in the chief cities of the United States during the last ten years, have been perpetrated by "Atheists or Freethinkers," that "a collection of the letters or other papers left by criminals when anticipating death shows a fearful number of instances, some of which many readers will recall, of absolute disbelief in the existence of a God or in any reckoning for wrong done in this life to be exacted in a future one," are statements so absolutely false that they suggest that the maxim nulla fides cum hæreticis is a part of the moral code of the pious editor of the Post.

Whoever has read the daily papers the past ten years knows that nearly all the murderers that have been executed in this country during that time have avowed belief in the Christian religion, and died expecting pardon through the great bankrupt salvation-scheme called the atonement. The letters and papers left by them, as well as their dying words, show that they lived, not with the Materialistic belief that cause and effect are invariably linked together, and that it is impossible to escape the consequences of our acts, but under the influence of the demoralizing doctrine that the effects of a life of immorality and crime can be washed away by the blood of a crucified Savior, and that, while a Humboldt, an Emerson, a Parker, a George Eliot, a Harriet Martineau, are likely to be damned for their unbelief, the red-handed murderer, if he "makes his peace with God" before dying, is sure to have a crown of glory and to be forever with the Lord. All the reports and statistics to which I have had access show that the great majority of criminals in our prisons and penitentiaries are from the orthodox denominations. The number marked Atheist, unbeliever, or Freethinker is exceedingly small. A large percentage of the seductions and adulteries recorded by the daily press are by Christian clergymen, with the account of whose amours the daily papers have teemed the past few years. When we hear of a defaulting bank officer, we regard it as probable, taught by experience, that he is a Christian, a church-member, and probably a Sunday-school teacher. The drunkards, prostitutes, and thieves who constitute the majority of offenders that figure in the police courts of our large cities are not Materialists or Infidels, but almost invariably believers in the Bible and Christianity, and persons whose indignation would be excited by a denial of the authority of the Bible or the efficacy of Christ's blood to redeem men from sin.

If observation, experience, and history teach anything clearly and unmistakably, it is that the strongest and most intense faith in religious dogmas may coexist with the grossest immorality. We see it exemplified in the lives of men to-day. It has been so in the past. "A wager might be laid," says Mommsen in his "History of Rome" "that the more lax any woman was, the more piously she worshiped Isis." Corinth of antiquity was as full of religion as of vice. The Byzantine Empire under Christianity existed nearly eleven centuries. Faith abounded and Materialism was unknown. Yet of that empire, Lecky says, "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed." "There has been no other enduring civilization so absolutely destitute of all the forms and elements of greatness, and none to which the epithet mean may be so emphatically applied. The Byzantine Empire was pre-eminently the age of treachery. Its vices were the vices of men who ceased to be brave without learning to be virtuous. Without patriotism, without the fruition or desire of liberty, after the first paroxysm of religious agitation, without genius or intellectual activity, slaves and willing slaves in both their actions and their thoughts, immersed in sensuality and the most frivolous pleasures, the people only emerged from their listlessness when some theological subtlety or some rival in the chariot races stimulated them into frantic riots. . . . Constantinople sank beneath the Crescent, its inhabitants wrangling about theological differences to the very moment of their fall" (History Morals, Vol. ii, p. 15).

The advancement of the world morally, as well as intellectually, has corresponded, not with the belief in theological dogmas, but with the increase of skepticism—which is the precursor of reform and the handmaid of progress—with the decay of theology and the diffusion of scientific knowledge. The most advanced nations of Christendom are the most "Infidel" nations, such as England, Germany, France, and the United States. Where there is the least skepticism and the most unquestioning faith, there is the least enlightenment, culture, and true morality. "The simple piety of our grandfathers" is still much applauded by writers like the editor of the Post; but it was chiefly a mixture of ignorance, intolerance, selfishness, and religious zeal. It encouraged slavery and the slave trade, advertised the sale of negroes together with New England rum, cheated and defrauded the Indians, imprisoned and banished Quakers, whipped women, repressed independent thought, and made and enforced laws among the most despotic and damnable that ever cursed any country or people. It is not denied that the men who did these things had sterling qualities, but they were not the result of their "simple piety," nor were their distorted ideas of right and duty, or the wrongs and cruelties they perpetrated, "due to the growth of Materialism, or what is termed Infidelity."

In periods of rapid transition from one political system or religious belief to another, there is liable to be, temporarily, more or less disturbance of the general order of society, due not necessarily to the influence of the newly adopted principles, but more likely to the inability of the mind to adjust itself, at once, to changes involving the abolition of forms or the surrender of doctrines which had been long associated in the popular mind with conceptions of right and propriety. The cession of a portion of France to the Protestants was followed by irregularities and excesses, to which Catholics of that day referred as evidence of the mischievous tendency of the teachings of the Reformers, with quite as much justice as some Protestant writers of to-day attempt to explain the increase of crime by ascribing it to the influence of freedom of thought in religious matters.

Some of the real causes which have led to an increase of crime the past few years are not difficult to see; but the pious editor of the Post, in his eagerness to make a point against "Materialism, or what is termed Infidelity," passes them all by, and finds the chief reasons to be religious disbelief in general and Atheism in particular! To his attention the following extract from Max Müller is respectfully commended: "As to Atheistic religions, they might seem to be perfectly impossible; and yet the fact cannot be disputed away that the religion of Buddha was from the beginning purely Atheistic. The idea of the Godhead, after it had been degraded by endless mythological absurdities which struck and repelled the heart of Buddha, was, for a time at least, entirely expelled from the sanctuary of the human mind; and the highest morality that was ever taught before the rise of Christianity was taught by men with whom the gods had become mere phantoms, and who had no altars, not even an altar to the unknown God" (Science of Religion, p. 52).

Discussion of the National Financial System.

BETWEEN DR. H. H. MORRISON AND JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

MORRISON'S FOURTH LETTER.

Mr. Truesdell's last article reminds me very much of the advice given by an attorney to his student when about to start out to practice law. Said the attorney, Young man, when you hav a good case stick close to the law and the evidence; but if you hav a bad case, then abuse the other man's witnesses; if it is a very bad case, then abuse the other attorney.

Mr. Truesdell—as an apologist for and defender of the national banking system—has a very bad case, and he knows it; hence his terrible effort to abuse me by trying to misrepresent my figures and meaning; indirectly accusing me of insincerity; that my "tirade" against the national banks "is not true," etc., all of which has failed to deceive the average thinker among the greenback advocates, if I am allowed to judge from the tone of the many communications received by me from all parts of our country.

Mr. Truesdell's article is a very nice plaster, intended to cover the lion's den, and will help to keep some in "the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity," and should it fail to deceive the greenback readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER it will at least tickle the lions. Mr. Truesdell did not dare to dispute the truth of my figures only as to the interest. I said that the interest received by the national banks from March 1st to September 1st, 1873, was a fraction over twenty-four per cent twice a year. He says it was "only 5.46 on their capital and surplus." Now I am going to make this dispute so plain to the comprehension of every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I will stand vindicated and justified in the writing of every word contained in my former article in relation to the national banks and interest on money.

| Nominal capital Sept. 1, 1873,..... | $488 160,951. |
| Circulation at same date..... | 353,968,249. |
| Real capital..... | $134,132,702. |
| Surplus accumulations..... | 118,113,848. |
| Net earnings for six months, from March 1 to Sept. 1, 1873..... | 33,123,000. |

Now I reiterate that the above net earnings is a fraction over fifty per cent per annum on the real capital, or twenty-six per cent a year upon the real capital and surplus earnings added together ($252,246,540). But Mr. Truesdell objects to this showing. He insists that the interest should be calculated upon the whole amount of capital and surplus earnings. He took good care not to say a word about the six per cent gold semi-annual interest paid by the government on $400,000,000 of their capital.

Suppose Mr. Truesdell should purchase a farm from a rich uncle for a hundred thousand dollars, and afterward the uncle would giv back to Mr. Truesdell ninety thousand dollars with which to bank on, or to use in such way as he saw fit. Now what is Truesdell's capital in the aforesaid farm, a hundred thousand dollars or ten thousand dollars? And suppose Mr. Truesdell, through losses, discounts, and the various devices connected with banking, earn fifty thousand dollars in one year, would you say that that sum was a gain on one hundred thousand dollars, or on ninety thousand, or on ten thousand—your real capital? In this case Mr. Truesdell would be sure to report how much he had made on his farm also, but the national bankers keep shady on the gold in trust received by them on their bonds.

Mr. Truesdell's article is the same old apology for the existence of the banks, and a special pleading for their superior excellence above all or any other kinds of banks. If one were to read his articles—which are the same arguments used by the agents of the national banks—and knew nothing of the other side of the question, he would conclude that the national banking institution was a national benevolent society, organized for the benefit of humanity; while nothing could be further from the truth. One unanswerable fact stands out in bold relief. In the Comptroller's report for 1878, page 49, we find the surplus earnings of the national banks on September 1st, 1876, to be $134,467,595. What does that mean? Simply this: that after the dividends were declared, all expenses paid off, there were net earnings divided among the stockholders amounting, for the year 1876, to the little sum of $43,638,162; and the surplus of one hundred and thirty-four millions accumulated since their organization was just that much accumulated by sharp tricks of the trade over and above the legal rate of interest that they were allowed to charge.

I hav no time to pay any attention to the complimentary names passed upon me in your last. Such language is not argument, does not convince the intellect. Bravery is a good thing, but cheek, when championing a wrong, is offensive; and you, Mr. Truesdell, hav been arrogantly guilty when you say that "the national bank system is not a monopoly in any sense of the word." Every reader of this paper knows better. They know that it is not only a monopoly but that it is a legalized monopoly.

In regard to a new unit of value, I will say this: Wait until we hav as carefully as we can investigated the present financial system, and decide whether it is based upon natural laws or not, whether it, in its workings, produces good or evil to humanity. This question settled, we will then be able to determine whether it be necessary or not to investigate a new unit of value.

I am glad you seem inclined to discuss the subject of interest on money. You hav promised to do so in your next; and as you took up so much space to answer my condemnation of the national bank system, you will hav to devote another article to the answer of my third letter. I hope that you will get down to earnest work, for I do consider the interest question one of paramount importance, yes, of vital importance.

You ask if we desire to destroy the present system and go back to the old banking system. I say, Yes, we do desire very much to destroy the present system, but emphatically, no, we do not desire to be cursed with the old system. The old system has been tested by human reason and experience, and it was found to be lacking in every essential particular needed to constitute a true medium of exchange. And what, pray tell me, makes the national bank bills any better than an old state bank bill except it be that the nation stands back of them, pledged to redeem them? Hard money advocates declare that Congress has not the constitutional power to issue a paper medium of exchange. If that be true, please tell me if it (Congress) possesses the constitutional power to delegate that right to individuals or corporations? Answer, yes or no?

Again, are banks instituted for the benefit of the people, or for those who organize and furnish the capital to run them? The solution of this question is answered in the statement of it and demonstrated in the experience of every business man in the land. Men seek to take control of the currency of the country in order that they may regulate the interest thereon, and by and through high rates of interest, together with the control of the alternate inflation and contraction of the currency, they inflate and contract the prices of labor and all the products of labor. In this way thousands of our most energetic business men are yearly bankrupted, real and personal property alike gathered up by the usurers and made to contribute to the power of a dazzling aristocracy, as well as all the corrupting influences growing out of pampered idleness.

Mr. Truesdell took up considerable space in telling how much tax the national banks hav paid since their organization, but he took care to not tell how much they had filched from the people through the channels of usury.

It is a well-established fact that individuals or corporations, when authorized to issue a paper medium of exchange like all other kinds of business, they will manage the business in such a way as to make all they possibly can out of it, regardless of the best interests of the people. The average increase of the wealth of the country for the last eighty years, over and above its consumption, has been about three per cent. This being true, and the people paying from seven to fifteen per cent per annum, it is an easy matter to tell who will own the wealth of this country in fifty years more. The money-traders will own the land—city and town property of value—while those who, by labor, produce the wealth will be in the condition that the poor Irish are in to-day in Ireland. I do not consider this an extravagant picture of the future condition of our country, provided we plod along under our present financial system. You say I showed but one side of the ledger, that my figures were garbled, etc. I now boldly charge you, as an apologist for one of the most wicked institutions that now curse our fair land, that you in your statement told but half the truth. I, as a private citizen, hav not, nor could not hav, any interest in fighting any public institution, unless I knew it to be injurious to the best interests of our country.

And now, Mr. Truesdell, as you were kind enough to send marked numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing your last article to the two national banks of my town, I will ask you to be kind enough to Mr. Bennett to buy and send a large number of the numbers containing my articles and send to the banks. The officers here know that I am an enemy to their system, but not to them personally. In my next I will promise you a shot at the national banking system that will exhibit the monster in all its hideous ugliness.

"When poor men's tables waste away
To barrenness and drought,
There must be something in the way
That's worth the finding out.
With surfeits one great table bends,
While numbers move along,
While scarce a crust their board extends—
There must be something wrong."

Obituary.

DIED.—In South Boston, Jan. 25, 1880, Mrs. Mary K. Fuller, aged 52 years, 6 months, and 29 days.

Mrs. Fuller was one of the brave and noble women that adorn life and scatter blessings in every sphere they are called upon to fill. Possessing rare good sense, great energy of character, decided convictions, and firmness of purpose, she won many true friends, and in her home was the bright star of love and peace that made the fireside, to her appreciative and affectionate family, the most charming spot on earth.

She was earnest and broad in her sympathies, realizing that the only salvation of the race must be in its advancement and entire freedom from all ecclesiastical domination. She was a frequent attendant at Paine Hall meetings, and a constant reader and admirer of the Investigator; and all through her illness, though suffering greatly, with the certainty of death before her, she was unwavering in her firm attachment to the Liberal principles, which were the guide of her life, making every arrangement for her final departure with quiet deliberation and unswerving firmness.

Her virtues are inshrined in the memory of her beloved and devoted family, whose consolation is in the thought that they had the privilege of such counsel and guidance, and the sweet comfort of her presence, for so many years. A large circle of friends lament with them her loss. But her example is still with them, while she has entered upon that sweet rest which in her last hours of pain and weakness she so ardently desired. Her remains were taken to South Wareham for interment, where, in accordance with her request, the writer conducted the funeral service.

REST.

Weary of earth, its trials and crosses,
Its clouds and its storms, its griefs and its losses;
Tired out with disease, with weakness oppressed,
I long for the blessing of infinite rest.

I'm weary, so weary, with burdens of life,
So faint from its battles, its toils, and its strife,
That of all the things that the world counteth best,
None seemeth so precious as beautiful rest.

The earth with her jewels, her grandeur, and gold,
Her most royal gifts are vapid and cold,
Compared to her moss-woven, flower-decked breast,
That holdeth the heavenly treasure of rest.

And why should I linger in deenest distress,
When sweetest sleep beckons, with gentle caress,
To silence that naught can disturb or molest,
Where soft, sighing zephyrs woo me to rest?

Sweet friends, let me go from your clinging embrace,
For my mission is ended—finished my race.
And gently as twilight fades in the west,
So soft let me sink to my longed for rest.

Afraid of the grave? No, its quietness deep
Ever invites me to undisturbed sleep;
The world has its gloom, its wrongs unredressed,
But the grave giveth only rapturous rest.

Its portals, with vine and sweet-scented flower,
Charm and allure as a love-adorned bower.
Safe in its shelter, thus evermore blest,
Bathed and infolded in eloquent rest.

The birds and the blossoms, and stars overhead,
Like angels shall watch o'er the unconscious dead;
While sunlight and moonlight, from east to the west,
Shall float songs of praise for exquisite rest.

You will weep as you look at my vacant place,
As you fondly remember the absent face;
But think, O my dear ones, no pain can infest
My haven of peace, my domain of rest.

In your deep grief remember humanity's needs,
And the heart-ache forget in kind, loving deeds,
Which, at last, like incense, never repressed,
Shall inwrap you in blissful, beautiful rest.

Farewell, then, a tender, a loving farewell.
My love and my blessing with you shall dwell.
The way is not long, though with cares thickly pressed,
And soon you will join me in eternal rest.

Yours, SUSAN H. WIXON.

A Private Letter Publicly Addressed.

DEAR ABBOT: "Things is workin'" here. The "Freelove Ring" is active. They meet daily; yes, worse than that, they meet nightly, and amid orgies such as the good and pure can never know, or at least only once in a while know, or for very worthy purposes know, for reasons that will justify their indulgence, know—let us see, what was I saying? Oh yes, they meet nightly—I mean the pure and good meet nightly, and amid orgies—well this is mixed.

Let us start again and get things right. I would not for the world get the pure and good jumbled with Freelovers. They might not like it—I mean the Freelovers. It would disturb the meeting nightly amid or—. On sober second thought I am not altogether sure it is orgies. There is a more pure and good word. They meet nightly amid beastly rioting where they drink and smoke and—do you smoke, dear Abbott? or do you drink? If you ever come on this New York way and join our revels, "we will teach you to drink deep ere you leave Elsinore." Anyhow, they meet amid "revelry by night, and Belgium's capital had gathered then her beauty and her chivalry, and all went" a "blarsted" sight more merry than "a marriage bell."

But don't interrupt me with your familiar quotations. As I was saying, they meet, like Nicodemus, by night, and the "obscene National Liberal League" is growing, developing, progressing day by day. Liberalism is organizing for a final winding up of the Cosmos in lurid pyrotechnics. The bottom may fall out any day, and the roof cave in, and you, dear Abbot, will do well to keep your weather eye on the danger signal. Put for the ramparts at the earliest omens, and hang on by the last tattered shred of "Christian morality" that may providentially remain fluttering upon the outer edges—hang on all alone, by yourself, in a minority of one. You will feel lonesomer than a "musquash when they went and dreened his swamp," but then it will be a good lonesome—for the rest of us. That is what makes you say, in your foreboding, "It is a matter of course that the repealers will not relish this issue of the Index. But in the apt words of another, 'When we want to drain a marsh we do not take the votes of the frogs.'" Too true, O Francis! The repealers didn't take your vote, the biggest bull among the frogs at Syracuse. They just "drawed" off the water, regardless that forever after you would croak and be dry. What on earth makes you think the repealers won't relish this issue of the Index? I am sure all the repealers thisaway are fond of frogs. They are good on toast; and, in their orgies by night, they scream, "Let the toast be—dear woman!"

How truly you say, "The way to get rid of bad leaders is not to submit to their lead." But you don't throw that out as a piece of news to repealers who bounced you so handsomely at Syracuse? Bearing that in mind, we understand you to a dot when you say, "There is not a more corrupt set of men anywhere than the ring which now control the National Liberal League, and this corruption betrays itself in their continued, united, and defiant support of proved scoundrels." On the contrary, this corruption betrays itself in their continued, united, and defiant knocking out of the support of a proved scoundrel and sending him adrift to be picked up after many days by those obscene clergymen of the "American Liberal Union." Much good may he do them.

"But von grey-haired oldt veller smiled crimly und bet
Dat Breitman vouldt pe a pad egg for dem, yet.
He has more on his pipe as dem vellers allows;
He has cards yet in hand und das spiel ist nicht aus,
Dey'll find dat dey took in der teufel to board,
De day dey pooled Breitman well ofer de ford."

The Free Love Ring meets nightly amid orgies—Oh! I told you that.

Now let us chop a little logic. Your chop this week is

"THE LOGIC OF 'REPEAL,' AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

"Resolved, That we are in favor of destroying the dams.

"Resolved, That we are totally opposed to the rush of the waters after the dams are destroyed.

"Resolved, That whoever says we are in favor of flooding the country is either a fool, a knave, or a Christian—which is the same thing."

Very good; but now it is our turn. The logic of unrepeal runs this way:

Resolved, That all virtue and purity must be dammed.

Resolved, That any virtue and purity that cannot be extorted by law, or secured by gagging the press and imprisoning editors, is not worth a dam.

Resolved, That any repealer who says we are not in favor of infant damnation don't know the facts in the case; for havn't we over and over again advocated and insisted that if one of these brats proposes to come, without a priest either made him or gave his consent, that infant should be dammed to ages—unborn.

Dear Abbot. What do you think of the damming business anyhow? Wouldn't you do well to try a system of jetties, just for a change. Take a little advice of captain Eads. Don't think, because you are toady enough to liv both on Liberal land and in Christian water, that you know all that is to be known about fluvial engineering. It is not good policy to dam unless you are going to set a mill on it. Don't deal damnation round the land. Confine yourself to water—or at all events to mud, which is your style of puddle and more native to you.

But speaking of infants, here comes the little waif that wasn't dammed at all, but was unexpectedly and prematurely born in a thunder-storm at Syracuse. The hairs of its head were all numbered, and they numbered eight till two or three got pulled out; but the poor thing, by taking thought, hasn't added a cubit to its stature since. It has, however, just added a name. It is one of the adders—"knotted adders," in phrase of the ever admirable Joe Cook. Under its maiden name, if it is a maiden, it did not smell so sweet. There wasn't enough of it ever to hold an annual convention; so what is left of it sent around a circular and wrote letters to itself, and got replies from its Judges and its Honorables and its clergymen; all uniting, especially its clergymen, in one sweet chorus that the National Liberal League was quite too awfully obscene for the dear little dwarf that hadn't "growed" since it was born, to hav a name anywhere near like its dear mamma. So it did what Scotty Briggs, in his funeral oration, said his poor dead fireman never, never would do—it "shook its mother"—and then it changed its own name. "America" was no doubt too big a name for such a little League. Of course it couldn't grow with such a load on its head. Besides its president has made himself so infamous during his administration of Leagues, and editorships, and every office he undertakes, that he blights everything that comes under his control! Nothing can flourish under the mildew of his influence. Failure is written in advance on the forefront of any enterprise he undertakes. Hence the need of an alias for this new concern, "sicklied o'er with the pale cast" of his Freethought, so that its chief officer might go on to new realms to conquer from good into evil, to new works of malice, of jealousy, of sordid selfishness, of libel, of false pretense, of repudiation of principles that he himself formulated—in short, to be the new and rehabilitated Paul Pry, President of the "American Liberal Union," worshiped and adored by Judge Hurlbut and George W. Julian, and by three Reverends, M. J. Savage, W. H. Spencer, and Robert Collyer of New York. These Reverends of course, as is their nature to, write obscene letters in advocacy of changing their League name as far as possible from the "obscene" National Liberal League, just as the Reverends at Syracuse, where and when this little cherub first breathed breath, notoriously the Rev. Gordon among them, were the only "Liberals" who uttered an obscene word. Flush a covey of clergymen anywhere and you start up a brood of obscenists. Here is Collyer's letter, and the others are like unto it:

DEAR MR. ABBOT: I think the change proposed in the name of our Society is needed. The question, "What's in a name?" as it touches the title about which we first organized, is only capable to my mind of one answer, as things hav drifted; and that is a very evil odor—what the Bible calls "a stink." I don't think I am over-delicate of the nostril; but some months ago I had to request that my name should be withdrawn as a vice-president of the original organization. Still I shall be glad to serve in a Union which will look to whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, and lovely, even though they be not as yet of good report. Sincerely yours, ROBERT COLLYER, Minister to the Church of the Messiah.

I would like to spread the very Rev. Spencer's letter before you also; but it is enough to say that he expressly apologizes in these words: "Excuse us if we seem to draw our illustrations from Five Points."

But now that the six or eight-leagued "Union" hav a new name given under heaven by which they can be saved from Liberal obscenity, which they don't like, and hav fled to Bible obscenity as expounded by Collyer, which they do like, it is fondly hoped that it will go on and outstrip the old League in numbers, in purity, in charity, and in all Liberal good works. Let us wait a year or two and see if the leopard who presides over it really can change his spots.

But, dear Abbot, I am sorry our new petition for repeal is so distressing to you, as the following evinces:

"The Freelove ring, which at once rules and ruins the National Liberal League, has just begun in New York to push a new petition for the repeal of the postal laws of 1873. This persistent attempt to get rid of the only effective statutes against the sale and circulation of matter declared to be criminal by the common law was first instigated and is now again secretly urged forward by parties who found their infamous profits cut down and their infamous business crippled. Pettifogging and unscrupulous lawyers were found to make out a plausible case for these parties, and to hoodwink the Liberal public by their cunning sophistries. But the merits of the case hav been already so fully and widely discussed that no excuse remains for further delusion. As an influential New York paper not long since put it:

'The recent discovery of the body of a murdered girl in a trunk at Lynn brought to light the terribly significant fact that over six hundred women, some married, some single, are recently missing from their homes, within a not very large geographical province, of which Boston may be regarded as a center. Most of them were believed by their friends to hav given themselves up to a life of shame. This is the terrible fruitage of such seed as Bennett and Heywood are sowing. It is a monstrous doctrine that denies to society the right to protect itself against such a crop as this. And those who deny the right hav only their own folly to blame, if an indiscriminating public regards them as accessories, after the fact, of a crime which they really abhor, but which they allow themselves by their theories of free speech so effectively to defend.'"

Did some humane person inadvertently ask you to sign the new repeal petition? If he did, and you blurted out your refusal in the foregoing terms, we hav to say that this trunk full of soiled dove found at Lynn is your baggage, not ours. It has your check upon it, and it is of no use to anybody but the owner. In the very terms you quote, it started on its travels from about Boston. It is covered with the same old hide with the hair on it, and the name "Christian Morality" is stamped in indelible letters all over it. Every express company that ever carried it hav pasted their card "Christian Morality," on every side, end, top, and bottom of it. Even the Custom Houses through which it has been attempted to be smuggled hav indorsed it "Christian contraband morality." Christian lies, Christian promises, Christian inhumanity to woman are the parents of these truncated remains. Beecher, Glendenning, Hayden, Trumblower, and their peers and colleagues, are own brothers to it, while there isn't so much as a "strawberry mark" on its arm showing even the most distant relation to Heywood, Bennett, or anything they ever wrote or taught. None but Christians or ex-Christians or apologists for Christians turn their daughters and their maid-servants out of doors when they get into trouble. "When lovely woman stoops to folly," none but Christians condemn her "to die." None but Christians abort their victims, and box and barrel and trunk up the remains of the savage convulsions that their murderers call love.

Dear Abbot, the petition for repeal will go on, the National Liberal League, under its "corrupt set of men," President, Secretary, Treasurer, and Directors, will still liv, and the Comstock laws will be repealed. The Freelove Ring will meet nightly amid—but there is no use of assuring you of that.

Yours Just the Same as Ever,
T. C. LELAND.

Nothing but Atoms.

The material universe—and I know of no other—is composed of ultimate atoms, in which are latent all the phenomena that hav ever been or ever will be observed; and any philosophy or science which claims that anything can originate is not founded on facts.

When these atoms aggregate into worlds there is nothing added; hence, when we see centrifugal, centripetal, and rotary forces in the worlds, we know these are in the atom; and if there are any other forces which do not proceed from these, they also belong to the atoms, and it is by virtue of this constitution of the atoms that they do aggregate into worlds. Of course all these forces act without cessation, whether in nebula, world, rock, or the human body. Now, in the formation of worlds, there simply is a condensation from a nebulous condition, continued until a crust is formed. This crust we call an igneous rock. This rock, of course, manifests certain properties. Now, let us suppose a case for illustration, which in fact, however, is not supposable, viz., that these forces in the atoms should cease to act. In that case any combination of these atoms would always be the same, would always be fire-rock, and of course would always hav the same properties. Their latent attributes would never be evolved. We would never know anything about hydrogen, oxygen, iron, gold, or indeed any of the so-called elementary substances. These would forever remain latent in the atoms. But now these forces do not stop, but are forever active, and are the cause of evolution, of unfolding these latent attributes of the atoms.

The so-called elementary substances are evolved, are unfolded, by the action of these ceaseless forces in the atoms. They all hav properties different one from the other. Their union or combination with each other again shows different properties, and so on ad infinitum. Now it is self-evident that in this process of evolution, of unfoldment of the atoms, there is nothing added to that which was latent in them while in the fire-rock, for such a claim would involve the creation of something which did not exist before. We know that the fire-rock exists now, and from it we hav every degree of unfoldment of the atoms, up to those in the human organism, and indeed those also which pass on and form that finer world which will be the abode of not only our own but of every individual organism, both vegetable and animal, that has ever existed or will exist on this earth.

The several forces are unfolded as well because they belong to the atoms, and are the cause of their ceaseless action. Electricity is the elementary force, from which are evolved magnetism, light, heat, vegetable and animal life, sensation, and intelligenee. Now, it must be evident that all these forces are only unfolded from the atoms. They do not begin to exist, for that again would involve the creation of something which did not exist before. From this it will appear again that we hav every degree of unfoldment of these forces, from the motion of the atoms in the fire-rock up to the highest intelligence hitherto attained.

Now, it is evident that there are really no non-vital forces, and hence the crystal is aggregated by the same force and in the same manner as vegetable and animal organisms are, which is in this wise: Two atoms of peculiar properties, such as the individual crystal presents, and of opposite polarities, unite or blend, and become an individual working power, and aggregate to them other atoms which hav an affinity for these; and this process continues until the centrifugal and centripetal forces are balanced, when of course no further increase can take place, for the atoms are thrown off as fast as they are attracted.

Precisely the same phenomenon takes place in generation. The ovum has within it an atom with a polarity different from that in the sperm, and they unite or blend in consequence, and join, as in the crystal, an individual working power. These now attract other atoms which hav an affinity for them, and this process of aggregation goes on until a balance is reached between the centrifugal and the centripetal forces, when a full development of the individual is attained, for now the waste and supply are equal; and this state of balance will last a certain length of time, when the centrifugal force will become greater than the centripetal, and a decline of the manifestations of life and intelligence becomes apparent only, for it cannot be possible that these most highly developed forces, as manifested in intelligence, do really decline. Such an idea, to my mind; does not really seem rational. But I can see how the less unfolded atoms of the organism can be displaced by those more unfolded ones, and in consequence the centripetal attraction will gradually loose its hold on the first, and they will finally be thrown off, when the organism is perfected with the more unfolded atoms.

This view of death, so called, does not disintegrate the organism; it is only throwing off the gross matter which is no longer attracted to it with sufficent force to hold it against the attraction of the earth, and could not exist in that finer world which is forming out of these unfolded atoms, of which tons are daily passing from the earth because the atrraction of gravitation no longer controls them. This fact really admits of a demonstration. This gives us a finer world, adapted to our finer organism, and makes death, so called, only a transition to that world.

Catholic Raids on the City Treasury.

The Roman Catholic church may know the way of life, in the higher sense of the term, and we may charitably hope does teach that way to its people, but in New York the road on which it is most frequently seen by the citizens is the road to the city treasury. The road is wholly its own, laid out by skilful ecclesiastical engineers, and well worn with constant use. Milton tells us that the fallen spirits built a bridge from their prison-house to this earth:

> "With pins of adamant
> And chains they made all fast; too fast they made,
> And durable."

We will not press the comparison too far, and liken the church's servants to the lost spirits, but surely they hav with as consummate art and durable pinning built their bridge to the city's cash-box. All attempts to drive them off hav so far failed; and they are now, under the color of the law, helping themselves as liberally to the people's money as in the palmy days of Tweed's Ring.

This statement will no doubt surprise many citizens who suppose that appropriations of public funds for the support of Roman Catholic institutions in New York are no longer known, but what is here asserted is susceptible of proof from official documents. In 1870 the church obtained from the city $676,495; in 1878, $710,350; in 1869, $771,612; in 1879, $657,107; with slight differences in the years the average is nearly the same. In eleven years the Roman Catholic institutions in and near New York hav obtained $6,007,118 of public money. The arts by which this corporate body has thus secured endowment for itself are worth narrating; and as Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins has searched the records, and has gathered and tabulated the facts, we avail ourselves, with his permission, of the fruits of his industry.

But by way of episode, an illustration may be given of the church's skill in securing private benefactions and then in protecting them from all charges for the support of the government. An Irishman, Cornelius Heeney by name, purchased a long time ago a farm near what was then the village of Brooklyn, but is now one of the most populous parts of that city. It was about half a mile in length and three hundred and fifty feet in width. It now covers nine city blocks, or two hundred lots, and extends from Court street to the river, and is bounded on the sides by Warren and Pacific streets. Heeney lived to the great age of ninety-four years, was a Catholic, but his relatives were Protestants. When he had reached his ninetieth year, says Mr. Hawkins, "the priests managed to surround him with their satellites, to exclude his relatives from his house, and to obtain a will from him giving to institutions of the Roman Catholic church nearly his entire estate." Most of the estate was devised to a benevolent society not incorporated. During the four last years of this Irishman's life the priests studiously prevented all access of kindred to him. They had the will already drawn to suit their purpose, and it was all-important to guard against the possibility of alteration. To make sure of their object, Heeney was, one year before his death, declared a lunatic, and one of their own friends appointed trustee of the estate. Priestly astuteness did not stop here. Before the property was acquired, an act of the Legislature was obtained exempting forever from taxation all the estate, real and personal, which the expectant society should hold. In 1848 Mr. Heeney died, faithfully watched over to the last by his ecclesiastical legatee. The property is now immensely valuable; if taxed, it would bring into the treasury of the city of Brooklyn $100,000 per annum. The efforts to obtain the repeal of the law which exempts it from taxation hav failed because the local politicians fear to lose the influence of the church.

The Roman Catholic Cathedral, on the corner of Fiftieth street and Fifth avenue, is an imposing pile; but no New Yorker can look on it without feeling that in order to build it the city has been outrageously plundered. The story of this robbery has been told and denied, but Mr. Hawkins gives it in detail, and relies on official records to make his charges good. The ground is eight hundred feet in depth, from Fifth to Madison avenue, and extends on its front and rear from Fiftieth to Fifty-first street. The church got possession of a lease from the city for a nominal sum. This lease was forfeited for non-payment of ground-rent. The authorities declined, however, to press the forfeiture, and changed the lease into a fee. When Madison avenue was run through this plot, the city paid the church $24,000 for the land taken, once its own, and then added a gift of $8,928 to cover an assessment. The block above, running from Fifty-first to Fifty-second street, was leased at a rental of $1 a year. The two blocks are now worth over $3,000,000. The consideration paid by the church for all this was votes. If the political leaders came down handsomely, the vote of the Catholics was at their service. The dealer in votes was invited to subscribe to some one of the church's charities. "Such an invitation," says Mr. Hawkins, "given to the managers of the Tweed Ring when it was in extremis, brought nearly $200,000 for the completion of the cathedral; and to the astonishment of good citizens, Tweed, after exposure, secured votes enough in his district to be re-elected to the state Senate by the largest majority ever given in this city for one senator." The cathedral is no doubt a monument of the piety of the Roman Catholics of the city; many devout members of the church hav practiced honest self-denial in order to promote its erection; but it is equally a monument of the unscrupulousness of their leaders, and of the shameless plundering of the city of New York. No architectural splendors, no beauty of decoration, can hide these scandalous stains. There is a marble in the West which exudes blotches of asphaltic blackness, and to the eye of every New Yorker who knows the facts the pure white of the cathedral's walls will always be darkened with the taint of fraud.

The greatest successes of the church, however, in extracting money from the public purse hav been won for its parish and other schools. It is the fixed purpose of the hierarchy that heretic New Yorkers shall pay heavily for the education of the church's children. And such an education! Mr. Hawkins narrates a conversation between himself and the late Cardinal Antonelli, papal secretary, upon public schools. "I described to Antonelli," says the narrator, "the free public schools and the state of public education in Massachusetts, giving that as a model of the American system. His reply was that he 'thought it better that children should grow up in ignorance than to be educated in such a system of schools as the state of Massachusetts supported; that the essential part of the education of the people was the catechism, and while arithmetic and geography, reading and writing, and other similar studies, might be useful, they were not essential.'" In this estimate of the value of popular education Cardinal Antonelli was by no means singular; his opinion was fully illustrated in the practice of the papal states, and unquestionably had the sanction of the pope. In New York city the Catholic parish schools hav failed to arrest the spread of Irish pauperism. From 1871 to 1875, a space of five years, the Department of Charities and Correction took charge of 98,787 Irish paupers, 63,178 of American birth, 24,273 German, and 17,653 of all other nationalities. These figures reduced to a ratio based on the last United States census of each race in this city, and taking the Americans as the unit of the ratio, giv the following result:

| Americans | 1.00 |
| Irish | 3 50 |
| Germans | 1.33 |
| All others | 1.59 |

The probability that a pupil from an Irish Catholic parish school will become a pauper is three and a half times greater than in the case of a pupil from a city public school. Whether this comparison is accurate or otherwise, the fact remains that the Catholic parish schools do not dry up the stream of Irish pauperism. They may teach the catechism; they may show the way to heaven; but they do not breed the manly independence which disdains a support from public charity. How should they, the offshoots of a church which has exalted mendicancy to the rank of an almost celestial virtue, whose whole aspect is of a contrasted splendor and penury, whose appointed order of life includes the Episcopal Dives seated on high in purple and fine linen, and the laic Lazarus in rags and tatters at the gate?

For these schools, so defective, so incapable of producing a good type of citizenship, the Roman Catholic church in New York has practiced chicanery, has joined hands with rascality, in order to make them a charge upon the city treasury. When Tweed was in power, the priests had all they wished for the asking; but in 1872 Tweed was overthrown. At the time of his expulsion and the flight of his accomplices the sectarian appropriations for New York, authorized in the tax levy, had reached the enormous sum of $1,000,000 for a single year. In 1874 two amendments to Article VIII, of the state Constitution, drawn up to prevent this subsidizing of a sect by the state, were adopted by the people. The first forbade the giving of money or the loaning of credit by the state to any association, corporation, or private undertaking; the second forbade any county, city, town, or village from giving its money or loaning its credit for such purposes. Unfortunately the first of the amendments contained a clause allowing the Legislature to make provision for the support of juvenile delinquents; this saved the Roman Catholic Protectory. A clause in the second amendment stated that no county, city, town, or village should be prevented from making such provision for the aid or support of its poor as might be authorized by law. These exceptions are on the face harmless, but they hav enabled the camel to get his head into the doorway of the city's treasury; by degrees he has worked in his whole body, so that he is again in full possession. He can now make his regular journey to and from the church's charitable institutions well freighted with the city's cash.

The precise figures are the following: In 1869 the Roman Catholic church received from the city $771,612; in 1870, $676,495; in 1871, $502 592; in 1872, $421,674; in 1873, $338,336; in 1874, $326 797; in 1875, $459,187; in 1876, $554,285; in 1877, $588,677; in 1878, $710,350; in 1879, $657,107. Let the ascending scale be observed. The daughters of the horse-leech, says the Book of Proverbs, ever cry, "Give;" the daughters of the Roman Catholic church, at least in New York, never cry "Enough." The brood is large; thirty-one charitable institutions of this one sect are benificiaries of the city. Among them the Foundling Asylum has had from us in eleven years $1,450,223; the Institution of the Sisters of Mercy, $278,630; the House of the Good Shepherd, $254,139; the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, $188,819; and still, despite these subsidies, the church's poor are in all our streets. From dawn to dewy eve do they not ring our area door-bells, waiting with capacious baskets to take what Protestant charity is ready to give?

Is the Catholic church, then, an institution for the promotion of medicancy? Does it not set an evil example to its own people by a failure to show a manly purpose to support itself? Must its splendors be maintained by downright robbery of the tax-payers? by adroit evasions, for the accomplishing of its selfish ends, of the Constitution and laws? The worst feature in the history of the Roman Catholic church in New York is that the corrupter the political rings, the closer are its bonds of amity with them. That fact alone will be its condemnation when the American people make their final judgment of its proceedings, as they certainly will. Bad as is the story of suffering in Cincinnati, it is the story of misfortune; our sympathies are touched for the venerable archbishop and his deluded people. But the story of the church's administration in New York is the story of a crime, and that crime will assuredly work out its own retribution.

One remedy alone will adequately protect the city from these intolerable evils in time to come—the withdrawal of approprations of public money from sectarian institutions of every kind, whether Protestant or Catholic, Jewish or Christian; and to this complexion we must come at last.

Obituary.

DIED.—At his residence in Patch Grove, Grant Co., Wis., Feb. 4, 1880, Jared Warner, aged 68 years.

The deceased was born in Canfield, Ohio, from whence he removed to the territory of Wisconsin in 1838, where he was engaged in lumbering and farming for forty years, retiring two years ago.

He was a Freethinker in the broadest sense, accepting no theories unless the facts could be produced that would convince his mind; a man of profound and comprehensive thought, he was a deep reasoner; candid and fair with those who differed with him, he won the respect of all whom he could not convince. He was early identified with the Liberal movement of the West. On the Fourth of July, 1852, he invited the Liberals of the then sparsely-settled county to his home in Millville, and there was effected the first Freethinkers' organization in the state. He spent some time after that lecturing, and many who are now Liberals owe their emancipation from superstition to the arguments and sound logic of Jared Warner. His reading was extensive and varied in history, science, and art.

He was intolerant of ignorance, superstition, insincerity, bigotry, and hypocrisy, and these in turn made him the target of there venom. A good neighbor, a firm and kind friend, a patriotic citizen, a loved father, a man of majestic mind has passed away.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT OF AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUE NUMBER 149.

WHEREAS, Death, the great leveler, being no respecter of persons, but paying his attention impartially to all—the nigh, the lowly, the rich, the poor, the young, the old, the weakly, and the strong—having entered our League and removed our faithful Secretary, Jared Warner, whose venerable face will greet us no more, therefore be it

Resolved, That this Liberal League does hereby declare that loss not only to be of an aggressive and active member, but that his children in him hav lost a generous father, our community a wise counselor, our country an admirable and patriotic citizen, and the human race a faithful and a common friend.

Resolved, That in him industry has lost a patron, pregress and invention an admirer, science and art a devotee, truth an investigator, and reason a worshiper.

Resolved, That this League tender unto each and all the members of his family their sincere sympathy, to all others, his example worthy of emulation. J. W. BIDWELL,

A Card from Mr. Campfield.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say that I hav removed my residence from Vermillion, Marshall county, Kan., to Wyandotte, Kan, to which place all communications should be addressed. I think we will hav fifty Leagues in Kansas before Sept. 1, 1880.

Mound City, Kan., Feb. 12, 1880. E. CAMPFIELD.

THERE is a certain theological instinct in mankind which is apt to put hard questions. We speak of Deity as being omnipotent, not because the word is a good one, for, indeed, it is a very bad and unsatisfactory one, but because it is the only word which even approximates to the expression of our idea of power in its supreme development. If our language were like the German we might make a word of seventeen syllables and so convey all the necessary limitations. As it is, we do the best we can with the materials at hand. We are therefore compelled to shrug our shoulders when some one asks us if Omnipotence can make two hills without a valley between. Human language is not good for much when we try to express exact ideas. The word irresistible is certainly a good one and an important one, and it seems something reasonably definite. The word immovable is also a good word, and one could hardly get on without it. Practically it expresses about what we mean. But when we bring the two words, each expressing an extreme, into juxtaposition, we see how futile it is to try to say exactly what we mean. For instance, suppose we ask what the consequence will be when the irresistible strikes the immovable? We are in a fog in an instant. And we are in precisely the same kind of a fog when we try to answer the question which the little boy asked when his teacher tried to impress upon his youthful but not quite reverent mind the fact that God can do everything. The boy thought of the problem for a few moments, and then said, "Can he make a stone so big that he can't lift it?"—Ex

Wendell Phillips.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just read with more than ordinary pleasure the article from Mr. Redpath regarding the peculiarities of Wendell Phillips and R. G. Ingersoll. My family, as well as myself, were delighted with the clear insight the writer gave us of the inner and social life of the "silver-tongued" orator. And yet after all (in my own case) I know not whether I was most pleased with what it said or what it suggested.

Wendell is ten years my senior, yet I well recollect with what love and esteem he was held by the foremost in the antislavery ranks as far back as 1839 Mrs. Carroll, a Hicksite friend, who attended the antislavery anniversary in 1841 (and from whose love and wisdom I received the best gift, in a measure, of a practical Liberal culture), came back from that gathering full of glow and enthusiasm over the gifted young man. We all read with avidity his unanswerable denunciations against the great crime of the age, and were ready at times to crown him with laurels equal almost to Garrison. I saw him for the first time at the anniversary of 1851 in New York, after the passage of the Fugitive Slave law.

When Rynders and his gang were employed to break up our meeting in the society library room, what a glorious host was gathered then! Garrison, the grand, noble, placid soul, though full of fire, was president; beside him stood, or sat, the grandest of all women, Lucretia Mott, and the venerable Isaac T. Hopper. Among the foremost workers were Abby Kelley, Stephen K. Foster, H. C. Wright, the two Burleighs, F. Douglas, Parker Pillsbury, Henry Green, Mary M. Child, and Ernestine L. Rose, the sweet little Polish lady, with moral and intellectual courage enough for a race of giants.

When the mob first began its hooting and howling, this true man (Wendell) sprang to his feet, and in a few fiery words, that reminded me of Patrick Henry's, said "that as the fathers of the revolution had given their lives to their country, they (the Abolitionists) were ready to giv theirs, if necessary, for free speech in the city of New York." Words cannot impart to the reader the grandeur of the speaker. Amidst all the confusion and uproar, it was a great privilege to witness the different grades of facial expression and forms of speech. Abby Kelley was sublimely grand in her womanly argument and scorn, mingled with pity, for the deluded Rynders and his followers; she knew who and what they represented. Pillsbury's reasoning was the most cool and severe of any. Stephen Foster was red-hot shot and shell of the "Greek fire" order. C. Burleigh spoke right on as though he were declaiming to the unconscious but stormy sea. Garrison wore a calm, fatherly smile; his prophetic soul saw how well Rynders and the Herald were helping on the work. Dear Lucretia sat as quiet as though it were a lot of children playing blind man's buff. She, too, saw the silver lining that the forms of the pro-slavery puppets partly hid with their little shadows. Isaac T. Hopper was very anxious to hav order, and called for the police, at which Captain Rynders set up a jolly laugh. While Burleigh was speaking, Hopper tried to induce one of the rioters to keep quiet and hear what the speaker had to say, to which the lover of righteousness replied, "Why, G—d d——n it, he's abusing the church."

These reminiscences clearly demonstrate the unity of reform. When Garrison was asked to what church Wendell belonged, it was natural that he should not know; they were looking to deeds. When he said he did not know an Abolitionist that was not a Liberalist, with equal propriety he might hav added, that while I know he is this, I also know that he is too complete a man not to be religious. Now, my Materialistic brothers and sisters, don't be frightened at the word religious, for it is all a matter of definition. I like Mr. Paine's, or Garrison's, "My country is the world; my countrymen all mankind." Wendell, Garrison, Parker, and their like, uttered no fulminations against the spirit they called religion and others simple morality. Yet who more radical than they? Garrison's fight against the sanctity of the Sabbath has no equal in our time. James G. Binney said the "American church was the bulwark of American slavery." Stephen Foster wrote it, "The brotherhood of thieves." To-day it is all these, ever and anon changing its tactics as science or the education of the masses compels it, but still holding within its partially concealed fangs the virus of its original poison.

I am not quite assured of Mr. Redpath's correctness in his comparison of Eastern and Western character; and though more of a Westerner by far than an Eastern man, it is possible to become surfeited with Western egotism. Of late years there has been growing in the Western mind a kind of contempt for Eastern manners and opinions, and especially is it true with reference to Boston and Bostonians. This doubtless arises from a very small class of the smallest Bostonians coming West to air their wisdom and vanity; men who hav acquired a theological education and who deem our people semi-barbarous and wicked. These fledgelings make poor headway with our pioneer habits, and their kid-glove piety receives a terrible rasping. These, however, are sorry specimens of true New England men and women. My honest impression is this: that nowhere in the "wide, wide world" has man and womanhood become so perfect in detail and so complete in its make-up as in the Eastern states in general and Massachusetts in particular. In no other way can I account for Garrison, Phillips, Charles F. Hovey, Channing, Parker, Adams, Childs, Chapman, Seaver, Emerson, Sumner, etc. These names, with many others, among which I proudly place Elizur Wright and Bro. Bennett, will make the soil of this part of New England more grandly classic than any portion of Greece or Rome. More grand, because these workers hav embraced in their labors all humanity.

The time will yet come when "Julien Hall" will represent more than Faneuil, as its doors were open for Garrison to plead the cause of the most despised and downtrodden at a time when every church barred its doors against him and those of old Faneuil refused to swing on their hinges.

Wendell Phillips says "one thing at a time," and Garrison was called a man of one idea, and yet Wendell never held to one thing. Antislavery, temperance, and woman's rights were the least possible measure of his one. While Garrison included all these, and, by way of dessert, was not ashamed to mingle with Spiritualists, avow his convictions in favor of Spiritualism and of secular education, with his exposé of the orthodox claims for the Bible, and at the very last to unite against the "suppression of vice societies." This is the measure of a man or woman of the very largest capacity. These are they who constitute our best specimens of human nature and to which we naturally look up as the highest representatives of the race. Few of us hav such a depth and breadth. Few, indeed, attain to any degree of eminence save in one direction.

It may seem very simple and easy for some to cut loose from old opinions and launch out boldly into the sea of progressive thought; to most persons, however, it is a very serious thing. To listen to opinions directly the opposite of those we hav been taught to believe were divine and sacred, to hear them treated with levity, and even profanity, is no trifling affair; and whoever pursues that course must not expect either kind treatment or a patient hearing. One of my reasons for admiring Mr. Phillips was the fact of his never adopting this line of argument. I would not counsel timidity, but I would recommend justice. And if Liberalists expect to be successful, they must be courteous to a fault in dealing with those who honestly oppose us. Mankind desire the truth above all things else. Every human soul aspires to liberty. What shall be the quality of the truth and the nature of the liberty depends a great deal on the lives and conduct of those who hav to-day its highest form in their keeping. Progress is slow, therefore every inch of ground we stand upon or gain let us use and cultivate effectually. Courage and justice are the watchwords; in harmony with these we shall press the right to a successful issue and giv light, truth, and liberty to those we vanquish. Yours for the right, George Lynn.

"Consensus of the Competent."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: For some time past I hav seen the above words floating in Liberal papers and credited to the Index, of Boston, which is the organ of "hi kulcher" in Liberalism. The true meaning of the words puzzled me much until I found a translation, after much search. As friend Underwood is a little tinctured with his "hi kulcher," and a scholar besides, I expected he would furnish a free translation for the more benighted, but he did not. I suppose he was too much absorbed in regretting the "coarseness" of The Truth Seeker in now and then showing up clerical vice, which is so often connected with "hi kulcher." I knew the cabalistic words must be related in some way to "hi kulcher," because too much showing up of clerical or ex-clerical peccadilloes is what seems to trouble "Consensus of the Competent" Abbot, of the Index. I suppose this is a mark of "hi kulcher;" then there are other marks that crop out in the Index. If a rival publisher happens to make a mistake it is a crime, and he is pounced down upon by all jealous, envious, rival publishers in the name of "hi kulcher," morality, and Liberalism; but it is very seldom deemed worthy of notice by them if a "hi kulchered" clerical saint is caught doing a good deal worse than writing letters to a virgin of 37 or 40 years of age, who has had several immaculate con—; but, as I said before, the meaning of these words puzzled me much, and I resolved to find a translation of their esoteric meaning. I had become a little rusty in the "dead languages" learned thirty or forty years ago at a district school—one will, you know, if his memory is not good. In the pursuit of knowledge I first turned to Webster's old spelling-book, the old English reader, and Dobol's arithmetic—the "standard" fifty years ago. No trace of the meaning of the mysterious words could be found there. Then I waded into Latin, sailed into Greek, dove into Irish, jumped into Spanish, swam into German, waltzed into French, walked in Choctaw, and crept into the Modoc, "con"-ing the lexicons of all these languages, but found no trace. Then I turned to what is regarded as about the oldest dialect, called "Sand-scrip," or Sanscrit, and found nothing there. Bound not to giv it up, as a dernier resort I opened a lexicon of the Cannibal Islands (not Fayal), which was presented to me by his royal highness, the king, and there I found the true translation. I did not think of going to this work first, because I did not suppose that any one but myself possessed a copy of it in this country; but it seems Abbot has a copy too. And I must tell you how I came to hav it. You see I was carefully educated for a "servant of the Lord"—of the great unknown "I am," and a "follower of the lamb," or, as the irreverent Josh Billings puts it, the "juvenile sheep." About 1840, being "duly and truly prepared," I was adopted by the American Foreign Missionary Society and sent as a missionary to the king of the Cannibal Islands. I was deemed the best fitted for that place of any in the graduating class because I was the most zealous and best-versed in the creeds and catechisms. I could answer all the questions promptly—that "we worship our God in trinity and trinity in unity, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance, for there is one person in the Father, one in the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost; but the godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one. The Father and Son and Holy Ghost are all one and the same, yet three different and separate persons. The Father begot the Son, the Holy Ghost begot the Son, and the Son begot himself; that we conceive of a circular triangle and a three-cornered circle, for there is one angle of the barrel, one of the bung, and another of the bunghole; but the head of the barrel, of the bung, and the bunghole is all one; such as the barrel is, such is the bung, and such is the bunghole; the barrel is solid, the bung solid, and the bunghole solid," etc., etc. So you see I was considered bright, and best qualified for the place assigned me. With a box of Bibles and Sunday-school tracts I sailed, with high hopes. Having learned that rum and Christianity had always gone together in evangelizing the poor heathen, and having heard this thing scoffed at by Infidels, I declined to take any rum; but as I was to preach the cleansing and saving efficacy of the blood of the lamb, I took a ten-gallon keg of grape-juice, representing blood. It was the color of old Cogniac. On my arrival I presented my credentials, and was cordially received by the king and given the best room in the palace, except the bridal chamber, and had hash free. But I always rejected sausages and roasts and broils from young cannibals or sailors that might be shipwrecked on the shore and taken in and made mince-meat of, as was the custom. Of course I went a little slow until I got my bearings. I did not at first unbox my Bible, but I uncorked my grape-juice as soon as I opened on the general subject of salvation and atonement by the blood of the juvenile sheep, etc. I improvised a "communion-table," and let the old fellow taste the grape-juice "in commemoration," etc. Everything went on serenely for about four weeks, and I began to think I should "fetch him," sure, and hav a glowing report of conversions to send home, when I fancied the Society would send me a remittance of ten thousand dollars, to promote the "glorious work" of soul-saving "by the blood," etc. The king and several of his cabinet had begun to hanker for the "communion services," and wanted to take a nip several times a day. They felt joyful over it, and, as I thought, were on the high road to salvation by the "efficacy of the blood of," etc. The king was very fond of hearing about America and its wonderful wonders, as I used to yarn them to him in our confabs, while we enjoyed cigarettes out on the piazza of the royal palace, shaded by magnolias in blossom, which gave off a most delicious fragrance. One day, thus situated, I was telling him about the "patriot war" of 1837 between the states and Upper Canada, when twenty-seven American patriots marched across Detriot river and ambushed in the orchard back of Windsor, driving seven thousand Canadian soldiers before them in utter dismay and confusion. He didn't question the last part of the story, but he wanted to know how twenty-seven patriots could march across a river without getting drowned. Then I had to explain that, in this wonderful country, in the winter season, the water would become so hard that an army could walk on the top of it in perfect safety. Then he got mad—thought I was trying to impose on him a big lie. I told him it was a fact. Then he got still madder, and said: "Look here, you Mr. Christian missionary, while I like the blood of the lamb from your country, you are a fraud and an impostor, and to-morrow I will breakfast off a sirloin steak and dine off a spare-rib roast cut from your Christian carcass! This is a royal decree!"

I must say that I felt a little ticklish in the region of sirloin steaks and spare-rib roasting cuts; but I put my trust in the "blood," etc. (which was in the keg), and took courage. I did not feel as if I was old Adam and had a rib to spare, so I offered him another nip from the keg and apologized in the name of the American Foreign Missionary and Bible Societies, which he refused to recognize. Then I did it in the name of the Stars and Stripes, the American Eagle, and Uncle Sam, which satisfied his wrath, because he respected those, if separated from the missionary cause. Then he apologized for getting mad, and then we joined at the communion table again, "in commemoration," etc., and everything was lovely. Under the wonderful influence of the "blood," etc., "peace on earth and good will to men" again prevailed. But I confess from that day I lost faith and confidence in my mission and the average value of souls to be saved in that particular part of the Lord's vineyard. Although the king was very attentive and polite—for he was a gentleman of "hi kulcher," and met me at the communion table with great cordiality—I could not but imagine that he felt changed towards me since that little conversation about water and ice, and I did not know how soon he might again misapprehend the teachings of the gospel, which made me nervous.

Well, under all the circumstances, in about ten days later, when a vessel came into the harbor and was to sail again the next day, I told the king that I guessed I would go over to Hong Kong, where there was great need of a missionary, and call on him again after a couple of months. He did not like the idea of my being absent so long, for he was about half converted; but when I told him I would leave the keg and all the "blood" there was left in it with him he was overjoyed. It was then that he took me into the royal library and presented me with a copy of the "Royal Lexicon," or dictionary of the language, in twelve volumes, illustrated. When I inform you that each volume is about six times as large as Webster's Unabridged (ten wide columns on a page), you will hav a faint idea of the magnificence of the royal present. He remarked that it would be useful to me, and now it has become so. That is the way I came by my copy. How did Abbot get his, as the work is never allowed to leave the island, except in very rare cases of royal favor?

Well, as I said before, when I opened this great work to find the root and branches of "Consensus of the Competent," I found what I was searching after. Running through 423 pages in Volume II, beginning with "Con" and "Com," I at last dug it out, and, when translated, it is simple, natural, and easily comprehended by everybody. The translation is this: "Conscious of the contempt of all decent, fair-minded people for doing mean acts from purely selfish motives."

When I finally found the mystery I involuntarily shouted, "Eureka," and shall ever regard my escape from being eaten up by the king of the Cannibal Islands as "providential."

Gunther Replies to Sotheran.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a letter I received from E. C. Walker, Florence, Iowa, my attention was called to Mr. Sotheran's reply to my article of Nov. 8th. I was astonished, as I had not seen his reply, and having more pressing business, I did not hunt for it; but yesterday I met the treasure by accident. Allow me then to say a few words in reply, lest my opponents conclude that they hav proved much by having said much.

I noticed in The Truth Seeker of Dec. 13th a criticism of my article above referred to by B. Skinner. As Mr. Skinner's reply was no answer to my article, I did not think it worth noticing, since the readers of your paper are as able to judge of its merits as I am. Mr. Skinner is no doubt a well-meaning man, but nature never intended him for a critic. A man who asserts that money is credit in circulation, and that money is not wealth, ought to read and reflect, but never write a word. According to his theory, those who hav millions of dollars in the safe are paupers. Admirable logic! For pity's sake I will leave Mr. Skinner and attend to Mr. Sotheran.

Mr. Sotheran starts out with the inference that my opinions in regard to Nihilists, Socialists, etc., hav been formed by the press. Nothing is further from the truth. I hav grown up among that class of people, and know from experience what I am writing of. His sympathy (if sympathy it is and not self-interest) does honor to the goodness of his heart at the expense of his understanding. Notwithstanding that, his resolutions at the National Liberal Congress at Cincinnati were out of place, and there was more important business on hand at the time. Such resolutions are well enough when the more important business has been attended to. The facts in the case are these: Mr. Sotheran went to the Congress, not as an advocate of mental freedom, but to propagate his favorite hobby—Socialism—at the expense of Liberalism. And here allow me to remark that there is a great difference between a person fearlessly maintaining his opinion and making a bore of himself. Good sense is always clothed with modesty, and is never found among the boisterous and blatant; therefore, Mr. Sotheran's conduct at that Liberal League Congress does not reflect much credit upon himself.

Next, Mr. Sotheran tells us that the Socialists of all countries are Liberals and Freethinkers. Far from it. I was well acquainted with many Socialists who took part in the revolutions in Germany in 1848 and '49. It is true they all proclaimed freedom and equality, but they meant by it the freedom of stealing from the rich and thereby making all men equal—that is, all poor. Look at the Socialists of this country—the Molly Maguires and the Pittsburgh rioters—were they not almost exclusively Irish?—the most bigoted people we hav in this country.

Mr. Sotheran intimates that Socialists are fighting for liberty of conscience and of industry in Europe. Ridiculous! Does he think he is addressing Hottentots, to whom Europe is almost unknown? What European Socialists call liberty of conscience is the privilege to think as they themselves do; and as to liberty of industry, they hav not even an idea what industry means. I admit the Socialists are almost exclusively laborers, but not all laborers are industrious; in fact, very few are; and here is where the much complained of evil lies. Those who work with a will, and are forced to work by an inward impulse, are industrious; but those who toil because necessity compels them to work or starve, do not deserve that appellation. The industrious often accumulate; those whom necessity forces to work never do. Yet even among the most indolent persons are some to be found who hav a little wit. They see that some men get rich while others remain poor, and they at once begin to theorize in regard to the cause of it, but being mere theorists and not practical men they grope around in the dark, and, catching a straw, they think that they hav found the tree of knowledge, and at once proclaim themselves the saviors of the world, and, finding followers, they instantly swell up and imagine themselves fit to govern kingdoms, while, in reality, they would hardly make decent bootblacks.

Mr. Sotheran's comparison between Bismarck and Torquemada is as senseless as if he had compared Columbus to a pirate.

In regard to the suggestion that The Truth Seeker issue tracts in regard to the demands of Socialism, I must say that I hav never seen a suggestion more brazen-faced. Let Mr. Sotheran prove his vaunted sympathy and liberality by his actions, and issue the tracts at his own expense. To The Truth Seeker they would be a clog.

In regard to Mr. Sotheran's postscript I will mention one point. He asserts that there are from one and a half to two million unemployed workmen and tramps in this country, and states that by reducing the hours of labor these men would find employment Did ever a piece of greater stupidity appear in print? The best thing Mr. Sotheran can do is to write a book to persuade every mother in the United States to drown her children, and thereby save them from the pangs of starvation, since there will be no work for them. Alas, Charles! Take to the spade and shovel and leave the pen alone. When the United States shall hav doubled or tripled its population there will be work enough for all, nor is there any want of work now. There are millions of acres of productive soil in the United States which can be got for the taking of them. If we cannot consume all the produce we grow, we can find a market in Europe. Let others go and turn up the treasures of the earth. We hav mountains of iron ore and abundance of coal at home, while we import iron and steel from England. Tell your Socialists to take their hands out of their pockets and try to turn up something instead of clamoring and allowing themselves to be turned, and, above all things, set a good example by being useful yourself.

Now I will take my leave of you, Mr. Sotheran. Since there are no laurels to be gained by disputing with you, I shall not take notice of your scribbling again.

Something New.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A stranger delivered a couple of lectures in the Methodist church in our village, a few days ago, and as his handbills were rather sensational, I thought I would hear what he had to say, and take some jottings for The Truth Seeker. The subject of his first lecture was, "The United States in the First and Second Chapters of Genesis." He had a blackboard fixed in front of the pulpit, on which the two hemispheres were outlined. He then endeavored to demonstrate that (1) America was the highest part of the globe, and (2) that this country was the first in the process of creation to rise (as he said) "above the waters, and separate the waters from above from the waters that were underneath;" that it was the firmament or solid foundation "that stood in the midst of the waters," as spoken of in the first chapter of Genesis. Next he tried to prove by the second chapter of Genesis that the Garden of Eden was the great Mississippi Valley; that the river which watered it was the Mississippi river; that its four heads were the Arkansas, the Ohio, the Missouri, and Upper Mississippi rivers; that the walls of the Garden of Eden were the Rocky and Alleghany mountains, and that it lies four-square; that Adam was placed here and his posterity for 1,656 years, and they were our prehistoric race. He also stated that Noah lived in New York and built his ark on Manhattan Island. The deluge coming, Noah was carried from the site of the present city of New York by "a strong east wind," due west 12,000 miles, to Mount Ararat, where he landed at the end of five months, which made the speed of the vessel four miles and three-fourths of a mile per hour.

Subject of second lecture, "The United States in the Last Chapters of Revelations." He said: "Col. Ingersoll and the Infidels, not being able to find the landmarks of Eden in Asia, utterly repudiate the fact of there ever having existed an Eden there; and, my dear hearers, you must either accept their statement or mine. Mine is the only one that tallies with the Bible, and it is the only one that givs the true landmarks [attempted cheers]. Do not cheer me, gentlemen; this is a very grave subject, and full of import to you all." He next informs his hearers that the colonies of America represent the eleven whole tribes and two half tribes of Israel; that we are half Jew and half gentile in our origin, and we are the new Israel; the negro is the Canaanite, the Indian is the Ishmaelite; that those relative positions towards Israel are defined by the Bible; that the doctrine of equality of races is opposed to the teachings "of the Word," opposed to history, to common sense, and repugnant to our instincts and social feelings; "and that we can never hav peace and good fellowship between the sections until the fanatics are overthrown, the present rotten government wiped out, and a new republic, pure and simple, is established on its ruins." I quote, "Then we hav cut the gordian knot, and disposed of the rings and bondholders and greedy cormorants that are fastened like leeches upon the people." He then attempted to show the exact similitude of Washington city to the ancient city of Jerusalem in all of its topographical features, and that the Capitol building is the veritable temple which is described in the fortieth chapter of Ezekiel. Now, my Infidel friends, what do you think of that? Dr. J. Barnsfather.

Let Him Tell a Dream!

Fifty-nine years ago I had a dream.

Journeying from East to West, like the car of progress, I found many hills to climb and descend. After each hill, a swamp. Here I had to hop from log to log, occasionally slipping between.

After a long and toilsome travail, having ascended and descended all the little hills, and passed all the swamps, I was on terra firma, gradually ascending a mighty big hill. The way was rough, rocky, and thorny, growing steeper all the way.

After a long, laborious climb, an apparently insurmountable precipice, not much unlike the wall—Table Rock and all—on the Canada side of Niagara Falls, seemed to block further progress.

Did I giv it up?

By efforts herculean I climbed, getting both arms on Table Rock. Resting for a moment, one more effort carried me clear from the penitentiary.

On the border of a gently ascending plain—a land of calm sunshine and gentle breezes, perpetual verdure and perpetual bloom—what do I now care for the trying scenes of the past?

I bless my saints for those heart-searching, reins-trying ordeals, enabling me to decide the question, Am I a vertebrate or only a reptile?

For a brief period after reaching the plain the rugged path I'd trodden was in full view.

Passing cozily on the gently ascending, ever increasing in beauty, plain, the rugged ordeal vanished from sight—from recollection.

I told the dream to Elder Calvin Mills. He said, "It is a gift to you, an epitome of your life-journey."

Nor am I disposed to question his verity.

In this, or in some of the "worlds without end, amen," all souls will hav a penitentiary graduation, voluntary or by compulsion, before reaching the happy mansions.

The Logic of Francis E. Abbot,

President of the American Liberal Union (formerly the Liberal League of America, now defunct).

Resolved, That since we cannot any longer be the President of the National Liberal League, therefore be it.

Resolved, That we hereby denounce the members and officers of the National Liberal League as a gang of immoral Freelovers, libertines, and scoundrels, and most emphatically declare that "there is not a more corrupt set of men anywhere than the ring that now controls the National Liberal League." (See the last Index.)

Resolved, That we believe in natural morality; that is, that every man shall be true to his own reason and conscience, and yet we are opposed to the doctrine of private judgment, and advocate individual submission to "the consensus of the competent," and thus Free Religion joins hands with Catholicism.

Resolved, That as all the vile Freelovers and libertines hav not only corrupted the name of the Liberal League, but hav also corrupted the name of "American citizen," therefore be it

Resolved, That we no longer call ourselves American citizens, but adopt a name that will truly represent us, which name is—illiberal and self-righteous bigots.

Resolved, That Abbot, Hurlbut, M. J. Savage, Sewall, Potter & Co., hav infinitely more faith in torture, imprisonment, and coercive laws than they hav in liberty, truth, and moral suasion, and that is the reason why they support the Comstock laws.

Resolved, lastly, That as the "Liberal League of America" never consisted of but eight auxiliaries, and as two of them hav sunk out of sight instead of joining the American Liberal Union, therefore the Abbot party seems to be progressing downward, like a cow's tail.

Yours cheerfully, A Repealer.

Detestible Spotters.

If there is anything more derogatory to the character of mankind, or more vile and infernal to contemplate by a decent mind, than a despicable sneak-thief spy and his employer, we hav never heard of it. And especially vile in their infamy do they become when it is known that they are operating in the name of temperance or religion—in the habiliments of heaven serving the devil.

There is not a principle of our democratic-republican form of government that these dastard wretches do not violate and trample under their feet. Nothing could be baser than the business of spotters, procurers, and informers against their fellow-men. They violate the first principles of civil and individual liberty, betray confidence, lie, steal, and commit perjury with impunity. They are professional blackmailers, ready for any manner of plunder, of the innocent and the guilty alike. History makes no record of any more execrable monsters than these incarnate devils and their employers.

It is time these vile, leprous scoundrels were taught that Americans are a proud-spirited, independent, liberty-loving people, who will tolerate no such superintendence and espionage over their conduct. No man who has the true and heroic spirit which a man should possess will submit to hav even the holiest religion of the universe crammed down his throat against his will. "Unrelenting war upon spies and spotters" should be the watchword until not one of them will ever again dare show his ungodly head in this country.

W. S. Bell.

Our townsman, W. S. Bell, has returned from the West, where he has been for nearly six months on a lecturing tour. He has lectured in many places in New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. We understand that Mr. Bell is thinking seriously about giving up the lecture field, to engage in business. His education, experience, and travels, in connection with his temperance habits, energy of character, and address, qualify him finely for business. We hav not the slightest doubts of his success.

Are God and the Devil One?—I hav heard of an instance in which S. T. Coleridge, my contemporary, a great mystic, but a man of most extraordinary talents, was expatiating in company in extremely glowing and captivating colors, upon the qualities of the devil. At length a lady who had been listening very attentively to his discourse, in the simplicity of her heart, exclaimed: "Mr. Coleridge, according to your account, one would almost mistake the devil for God." To which the philosopher rejoined, in a tone of peculiar significance, "Madam, the devil is God." Now, certainly, if we are to take the expressions above cited [Goodwin had been quoting many horrible passages from the Old and New Testaments to the tune of "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord"] for a liberal description of the character of the Creator of the universe, we might with sufficient propriety adopt the inference, God is the devil.—*Wm. ## Is Anthony a Thief?

About seven years ago a publisher of this city named Lange, while moving his establishment, found some mail bags among the rubbish. He thoughtlessly told his coachman to take them to his house. There is a law upon our statute books which reads as follows:

Any person who shall steal, purloin, or embezzle any mail bag, or other property in use by or belonging to the Pott-Office Department, or who shall for any lucre, gain, or convenience, appropriate any such property to his own or any other than its proper use, or who shall, for any lucre or gain, convey away any such property to the hindrance or detriment of the public service, if the value of the property be twenty-five dollars or more, the offender shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than three years; and if the value of the property be less than twenty-five dollars, the offender shall be punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by a fine of not less than ten dollars, and not more than two hundred dollars.

Publishers mailing large amounts of printed matter at pound rates are allowed to take these bags, properly labeled, to their offices and fill them there. This is done to facilitate the forwarding, thus lightening the work of the post-office. Mr. Lange, being one of the largest publishers of the city, was given these bags as a matter of course. He ought to hav returned them to the office, and it was only thoughtlessness that prevented him. His coachman, whom he subsequently discharged, gave information at the District Attorney's office, and Lange was summarily arrested, charged with a violation of the law we quoted. He was tried and convicted, the value of the bags being fixed by the jury at less than twenty-five dollars. Judge Benedict, tyrannically intending to sentence him to the full penalty, made the sentence one year's imprisonment and two hundred dollars fine. The law does not allow both fine and imprisonment, and upon this mistake of the ignoramus, Lange was released by the Supreme Court of the United States after paying the fine and being imprisoned two or three months. This case was fully set forth in THE TRUTH SEEKER last year, and though it was conclusively shown to be a thoughtless and not wilful violation of the law, the bigot who disgraces the United States bench was anxious to subject an American citizen to the direst penalty attached to the offense.

But how does it work when the man who violates the statute is his high mightiness, Anthony Comstock, special agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice and a post-office agent besides, who knows all about postal laws? He cannot plead ignorance of the law, and everybody knows he had no business with mail bags. One of Truth's reporters called at the office of Anthony one day last week. The valiant warrior was not in, but Britton was, engaged in an occupation eminently suited to his intellect—sweeping up the floor and clearing out the waste paper—probably some of his old stock which was not quite racy enough to take to Congress. The leering little Jew was putting this waste paper into United States mail bags. He had four of them, which were put on a dray and carried a junk shop. Where Comstock got the bags, or by what right he keeps them, no one knows. Postmaster James, when interviewed, was totally ignorant of the matter; so was special agent Sharratt. This waste paper belonged to Anthony's Society, and was sold for its benefit; that is, if Britton's perquisites do not include the waste paper. A private society had these mail bags contrary to the statute made and provided. Postmaster James, as honest a postmaster as there is in the United States, did not authorize Comstock to take them, and the question is, Where did he get them?

A complaint was subsequently lodged in the District Attorney's office against Comstock, who took the bags, and Atterbury, a paper dealer, who received them, but what could be expected when the District Attorney is a member of Comstock's society? He does exactly as he did when Colgate was plainly and without the least particle of a flaw in the evidence proved guilty of mailing improper documents. He sent for Comstock and told him a complaint had been lodged, treating it as a good joke. Talking about it afterwards Comstock boasted that it would "come to nothing."

But with all the bravado of Comstock and the subserviency of our officials the fact remains that Comstock has committed this crime against the laws of the United States. Probably, owing to the pusillanimity of the prosecuting officer, he will go unwhipped of justice as did his superior officer of the society, Colgate. As we pointed out last week, this society has its members in all the various departments and places necessary to a jesuitical government of the post-office, and it is very unlikely that it will allow its foremost scoundrel to be punished for a little thing like using mail bags, without any authority from the proper persons. This is a nice state of affairs, when people against whom Comstock has a grudge are punished heavily, but when the offender is Anthony himself, the District Attorney, who is sworn to obey the law, violates his oath of office, and allows him to go scot-free. Truth hits it when it says, "Comstock commands Woodford as he commands that mental, moral, and physical image of himself [Britton] who plays the part of his office boy and factotum."

It is to be hoped that we shall sometime hav a District Atttorney who is not a member of any jesuitical society, and who will deal out justice with an impartial hand. Until we do Comstock and Colgate will never get their just deserts.

An Interested Christian Friend.

The writer of the following, which came to us on a postal card, is evidently one of the church militant who believe in bombarding the works of the enemy. The great boldness of the individual is more apparent when it is known that no name is signed. From somewhere in New Jersey the valiant warrior in Christ hurls this missive at us, and evidently expects THE TRUTH SEEKER to suspend publication and all the people engaged in it to seek salvation. This is the card:

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Poor Deluded Sinner: Why so presumptuous as to fight against God? I would ask you to go back to the death-bed of every Infidel writer (See Paine! Voltaire!), whose deaths were distressingly awful. And I hav never heard of an Infidel whose death did not belie his whole life, evidently tasting something of the pain of hell before leaving this world. But if you will spurn this warning, I beg of you to giv this prediction (that your death will also be the dreadful horror of remorse and despair) a little space in your memory; and when the darkness of death comes, if this prediction is not true, yours will be an exceptional case. May you take warning ere it be too late!

Now, we want to know how this anonymous person knows we are deluded? How does he, she, or it know that there is a God whom we are fighting against? Did he, she, or it ever see God, ever hear, ever feel, ever smell, ever taste him? Did he, she, or it ever see anybody who ever did? Is there any evidence that there is a big, personal, ever-changing and unchangeable power that rules this universe with a wave of his hand? a power so vast that its presence fills all space and yet can be confined in a little box two feet square? That is the popular conception of the Christian God, derived from the Bible, and we are asked why we "fight" it? We don't. To dash against this would be more ridiculous than Don Quixote's crusade against the windmills. We do not believe that such a thing exists, and consequently we cannot "fight" it. And if there is a "God" we do not believe he wants any anonymous championing. If he can swing a world through space, as a man swings a cat by the tail, we think he can attend to our case without any support from New Jersey. If he cannot, he would do well to resign his Godship.

Our friend wants us to go back to the death-beds of Voltaire and Paine. He, she, or it thinks there is sufficient to convert us. Their last hours, were, according to this anonymous champion of Christianity, "distressingly awful." This is what the lawyers would call an ad captandum vulgus argument, for it certainly possesses neither sense nor logic. And in the two cases cited it lacks the very essential element of truth. Voltaire's last hours would hav been very peaceful if the priests had let him alone, and but for the impertinent interference of ecclesiastics, and their lies, there never would hav been any ground for the malicious slanders regarding Paine. If we pass away as quietly as did these two great men, and with no more fear and trembling, we think our correspondent will not get much consolation for his theology from our death-bed. If he, she, or it "never heard of an Infidel whose death did not belie his life," we must conclude that his, her, or its information is limited to that to be obtained from Sunday-school tracts, wherein all the good little boys die and turn into angels, and all the bad little Infidel boys get drowned on predatory fishing excursions performed on the Sabbath without the knowledge of their agonized Christian mothers.

Within the last few years many of our heretical friends hav died, but we hav not heard of any "recanting" or calling upon the Lord they had cast aside in life. There was no crying, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" as in the case of Jesus, who sweat great drops of blood when he realized he was about to die. There was no fear of a burning, glowing sea of molten misery, into which they were to be thrust and kept under by long-tailed devils, with three-tined pitchforks. There was no fear of a huge angry God to pass judgment and condemn them to eternal misery because, with the brain and heart he had given them, they denied that he was an infinite monster, and that an illegitimate Jew was his son. They left this world in the calm assurance that they would go back whence they came—to nature and eternal quiet. They had no hope of sharing in the pomp of heaven and no dread of the miseries of hell. Their friends were not agonized by the thought that perhaps they had neglected some rite of the church necessary to salvation—had forgotten some little particular, or in their inmost heart of hearts doubted some passage of scripture, or were perhaps not certain whether, to "take," baptism ought to be by sprinkling or immersion, or whether they were entirely sound on the whole five points—and had not, after all, gone to hell. It was not to them as it was to the Rev. Albert Barnes, "all dark, dark to my soul;" but the good they had done lighted the way, and they passed over quietly, knowing that if there be another world they had done the best their opportunities would allow them to fit themselves to enjoy it. How much more manly it is to depend thus, to feel confident of our own good intentions, than to depend upon the merits of another—to say we blindly believe what our reason rejects, and endeavor to get floated into heaven on the blood of a "savior" who could not save himself from an ignominious death!

The he, she, or it who feels such solicitude for us evidently felt that we would spurn this offer to let us come back to Jesus, and hazards its reputation as a prophet that "your (our) death will also be the dreadful horror of remorse and despair." We differ with it. Unless we get softening of the brain and turn Christian, we hope to pass away, when our time comes, as quietly as Paine, as peacefully as Voltaire, as nobly as hav our friends, and not crying, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

If it writes to us again it will please sign its name.

NEW BOOKS.

On the last page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be found a list of new books which we hav added to our stock. We hav bought the books, plates, tracts, etc., of C. P. Somerby, and he has gone out of business. Failing health has forced his retirement, and we hav purchased his books at a low rate, which enables us to reduce the prices. We hav put the "Martyrdom of Man," one of the best Liberal books ever published, at $2, a reduction of one dollar. Tyndall's "Advancement of Science," containing the Belfast Inaugural and the famous articles on Prayer, with portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall, bound in cloth, has been reduced from one dollar to fifty cents. Bound in paper, 25 cents. The "Issues of the Age," by Henry C. Pedder, has been placed at one dollar. The former price was $1.50. "A Few Words About the Devil," by Charles Bradlaugh, price $1.50, is one of the works which every Liberal wants. The Tracts are by the very ablest English Liberal authors. In quantities we will giv the same discount on them that we do on those printed by ourselves. We hope to sell a good many of them.

Of course in purchasing this stock THE TRUTH SEEKER has assumed obligations which will hav to be fulfilled, but we believe the Liberals want these books, and we want to supply them. THE TRUTH SEEKER is destined to be come the great Liberal paper of the country and headquarters for Liberal publications. Mr. Somerby had no means for making known to the public the value of these publications, and we hav undertaken it, feeling it to be not only a good thing for THE TRUTH SEEKER but for our friends all over the country as well.

A Card from Mr. Somerby.

TO THE LIBERAL PUBLIC: I hav sold out my stock of Liberal books and pamphlets to D. M. Bennett, and cordially recommend all in want of excellent Liberal literature to send their orders to him. Freethinkers who hav not already secured all of these publications should at once do so. No one can longer afford to be without "The Martyrdom of Man: a Compendium of Universal History;" "Nathaniel Vaughan," one of the very best Freethought and labor-reform novels; "A Few Words about the Devil;" Bradlaugh's sarcastic and logical work, and others. Unusually good and cheap weapons for missionary work are the witty, spicy, and unanswerable "Iron-clad" and "Manna" pamphlets, written by the leading and most able English Freethinkers. I trust my former patrons will send whatever orders they may hav to Mr. Bennett.

C. P. SOMERBY.

A Letter from Elizur Wright.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 20, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The inclosed [$10] will, I hope, somewhat more than extinguish my debt to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I shall want Mr. Bennett's book as soon as it is published. I am glad to see his plucky letter to the President, and do not envy the feelings of the latter when he reads it. In the matter of Mr. Bennett's trial and imprisonment, the "powers that be" in this "republic"—no matter who ordained them—hav, in my opinion, brought the greatest disgrace upon it which it or any of its states hav suffered since the hanging of John Brown.

Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

MRS. CORA S. V. RICHMOND will lecture at the Academy of Music, Rochester, N. Y., Tuesday evening, March 2d. This is the first time for many years that Mrs. Richmond has visited that city to lecture, and this being near her native town, she will be cordially welcomed by early friends, and many who hav in later years accepted the facts and philosophy of modern Spiritualism, of which she has become such a distinguished advocate.

WE should hav acknowledged last week the receipt of a cabinet-size bust of Col. Ingersoll from his publisher, C. P. Farrell. It is the work of the eminent artist Clark Mills, and is one of the very best pieces of art that gentleman has turned out. It is the same that we advertise, and we understand Mr. Mills is kept busily employed in supplying the demand. We are under obligations to Mr. Farrell for his kindness and liberality in adorning THE TRUTH SEEKER office with such a perfect likeness of so magnificent a man.

F. E. ABBOT quotes this with approval from the Catholic Review. With a few more such editors Liberalism would progress rapidly—backwards: "The greatest kindness that it is possible now to do the memory of Tom Paine is to let oblivion cover it with moss. If there is sense in the adage, 'Let sleeping dogs lie,' there is greater sense in not going out of our way to stir up a compost heap which time is rapidly resolving into its kindred dirt." One of Abbot's peculiarities is the intense gusto with which he copies and spreads and circulates to the extent of the limited circulation of the Index all the vile flings emanating from the rotten breathings of a decaying superstition. The very worst they can say is too tame for his fiery spirit. Looking at his conduct impartially we can only conclude that he is either an idiot or a traitor. We are convinced that he is not the former.

MOSES HULL lectured before the Second Society of Spiritualists, at Masonic Temple, this city, on Sunday last, with "The Comparison between the Evidences of the Resurrection of Jesus and Those of Modern Spiritualism" for his subject. He spoke to large audiences morning and evening. Moses may be a little off color on the social question, but on the subjects of finance and Liberalism few are nearer to the true blue.

Liberal League Notes.

"IT makes me almost ready to wrangle with my own honesty," must hav been the thought of every one who is engaged in the Liberal League movement after reading Abbot's indictment of us all in the Index of February 12th. "There is not a more corrupt set of men anywhere," says this oracle. Horrible to contemplate! And but one way is left for us to redeem our character. Elect Francis Ellingwood Abbot to the Presidency of the National Liberal League. Had we not bet'er do it? Hurrah for an Abbot boom!

MR. JULIUS REICHHELM has set a noble example to the Liberals who hav money by contributing twenty-five dollars to the treasury of the National Liberal League, and taking out a certificate of life membership. Are there not one hundred Liberals in the United States who will follow Mr. Reichhelm's example? That would put into our treasury twenty-five hundred dollars and enable the League to push its work forward with greatly increased vigor. I am sure that our worthy Treasurer, Courtlandt Palmer, of 117 East Twenty-first street, would be pleased to acknowledge the receipt of such contributions, and Prof. Rawson, our Secretary, would issue the life memberships with joy. Who will be the next person to take out a life membership?

ONE thing is already assured, and that is that the National Liberal League is to be a great and powerful organization. During the last week five auxiliary Leagues hav been chartered, viz.: Nos. 163, Fourth Creek, Kansas, Secretary, J. H. Markley; 164, Harlan, Iowa, Secretary, Charles W. Potter; 165, Moderro, California, Secretary, C. M. Courtwright; 166, Dowagiac, Michigan, Secretary, Thomas Rix; 167, Burr Oak, Michigan. And that is not all; the able Spiritual journal, Mind and Matter, of Philadelphia, bravely comes out this week for the Liberal League movement, and promises hereafter to champion our cause. This is a valuable accession to our ranks and will greatly aid the movement, I am sure. Dr. R. C. Flower writes: "You will find in J. M. Roberts (Editor of Mind and Matter) a mighty man—an absolute conquerer." That is the kind of man the times demand. Friends of the Liberal League movement welcome Mind and Matter to our ranks.

FROM the territory of Dakota our earnest friend, C. H. Goddard, sent me by the last mail this encouraging news: "I hav raised the money for a charter for the Turner County Liberal League, which I shall take out soon. I hav taken steps to organize a League at Sioux Falls and one at Yankton. Turner League will number thirty members." I am pleased to learn Bro. Goddard is circulating many of Mr. Bennett's publications.

MRS. O. K. SMITH informs me that her friend Mrs. Amelia H. Colby and herself are laboring to organize Leagues in western New York, and I am pleased to learn the fact, as there is need of very much of that kind of work being done in the Empire state. She says: "A League will be organized next Sunday after our meeting at Johnson's Creek, and the friends there are taking active measures to build a Liberal hall. I fully believe our labors here will result in the organization of the Spiritualists and Materialists into one of the largest Liberal Leagues of the state." Mrs. Smith informs me that the prospects are that a large auxiliary League will soon be formed in Lockport. And right here may I ask the Liberals of my own state to arouse themselves in every town and organize themselves into Liberal Leagues. We should hav thirty new Leagues in two months.

HON. CHARLES S. BAKER, member of the Assembly from Monroe county, I am gratified to learn, has introduced into the New York state Legislature a bill to tax church property. Mr. Baker writes to me under the date of February 18th:

H. L. GREEN, Dear Sir: Yours of 16th at hand and noted. Prepare and send me your petitions and they will be considered by the House. The bill to tax church property seems to meet with general favor among a large majority, not only of the members of the Assembly, but citizens generally. Yours truly,
CHARLES S. BAKER.

Friends of the Liberal League movement, now is the time to work for church taxation. Keep the petitions moving. Can't we send in fifty thousand names? Every Liberal should write to his representative in the Legislature to vote for Mr. Baker's bill.

I HAV just read with much interest in the Banner of Light of to-day the proceedings of the Northern Wisconsin Convention of Spiritualists and Liberalists. The proceedings throughout were of a broad, Liberal character. Resolutions in favor of church taxation and against the enactment of laws giving any particular class of persons the right to practice medicine were unanimously passed, and at the close of the meeting a Liberal League, consisting of fifty-one charter members, was organized. Prof. W. F. Jamieson's address at the Convention was highly commended. Let the great body of Liberals thus work together in harmony everywhere and we shall be a power in this country. "In union there is strength."

THE Fourth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League—Where shall it be held? I am pleased to notice that this question is already being discussed in the Liberal papers. And the time and place should be decided upon by the first of May. Our Western friends desire to hav it held in Bismarck Grove, Kansas. The only objection to that place will be that it is so far west. But I learn that Jay Gould, the great railroad king, is much interested in making Bismarck Grove the great gathering place of the West, and it is thought that he will send an excursion train from New York city at very low rates to accommodate our delegates.

By the time the Congress meets we shall have at least three hundred auxiliary Leagues. This will give us fifteen hundred delegates besides the hundreds of people who would like to attend the Convention if very cheap rates can be procured. We should hav excursion rates of $15 from New York City, and $10 from Chicago one way, and free return tickets to all who attend the Convention. Some friend who is in the railroad business should at once see Mr. Gould and learn what arrangements can be made. If a certain number of passengers are required to be pledged, then let arrangements be made to get a list of the persons who will attend. This subject, of course, is for the Board of Directors to decide, and I am sure they will like to learn of the views of the friends generally. The above suggestions I make, of course, not as a member of that Board, but as a private in the ranks. But wherever we go, let all unite to make the next Liberal League Congress a gathering of earnest, brave people, whose influence will be felt throughout the whole country. H. L. GREEN.

Salamanca, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1880.

P. S.—If arrangements of the above character can be made, it will be a grand opportunity for our friends generally to make a visit to the great West. The Congress should be held the last of August.

Iowa Notes.—Other Facts.

County Chairmen hav been appointed as follows:

Bremer, Matthew Farrington, Denver; Clinton, Mrs. Anna T. Wild, Clinton; Dubuque, H. Gilmore, Farley; Fayette, Jerome Carter, Randalia; Jackson, A. L. Potter, La Motte; Scott, Mrs. M. L. Follett, Le Claire.

These are all good workers. Mr. Farrington is President of the Liberal League of Northern Iowa—the liveliest League in the state—judging from all appearances. To Mrs. Wild is due no small share of the credit for the building up of the Liberal Society in Clinton. Messrs. Gilmore, Carter, and Potter are laying out their work, appointing township committees, circulating documents, and doing all else possible for the good cause. They hav a Freethought Library Association at Farley, and Mr. Gilmore assures me that "revivals" didn't revive worth a cent in that town. I hear the same good news from all over the state, wherever the Liberals are alive and aggressive.

Mrs. Follett "still livs," although reported dead by a TRUTH SEEKER correspondent (a chirographical or typographical blunder, probably). She has established a circulating Freethought library, and in the last number of the Le Claire Pilot calls upon the Liberals of Scott county to rally to her assistance and help her organize the county by townships in these counties. Let the true friends of secularism help these men and women to the full extent of their ability. Do not forget to send them stamps to defray expenses of correspondence.

About fifteen towns in Iowa are talking of organizing Leagues, and the necessary instructions and documents hav been forwarded. There are five times that many towns and cities having a sufficient number of Liberals to form good, strong Leagues if these Freethinking men and women but awake to the vital necessity for combination upon the part of noncomformists.

We want no more Heywood and Bennett imprisonments in this country.

A PREACHER in a certain inland city of this state has got into the now somewhat fashionable habit of having his hearers hand up to him questions to be answered then and there. A few Sundays ago this question was presented: "Can the devil be in two places at the same time?" Without a moment's hesitation the "Oracle of the living God" answered: "No, certainly not. If he could be in two places at the same moment, he might be in four or ten or twenty. No, the devil is not omnipresent, but he has an inconceivably rapid power of motion!" All temptation comes from his sulphurous majesty, we are assured by the saints. In the light of the above explanation how comes it that millions of people in different parts of the world are tempted at the same moment?

MRS. H. S. LAKE and Mr. Peck hav performed a grand work in Clinton. A Liberal society was organized, and regular Sunday meetings are held. When Mrs. Lake first went there, about eight months ago, there were but three outspoken Liberals, known as such, in Clinton—of course there were other secularists—but they were in fear of the church and dared not come out openly and express their honest sentiments. The ecclesiastical power and influence has been exerted to the utmost to prevent organization and to break up the Sunday meetings, but in this they hav not succeeded. The Freethought Hall is crowded to overflowing each Sunday and the interest is increasing. The churches hav been unable to get up a revival this winter, and so the light spreads.

THE Liberals of Iowa and of the country generally would do well to secure Mrs. Lake for a course of lectures.

CLARKE IRVINE, ESQ., of Oregon, Mo., will speak upon the living issues of the hour, at any point within one hundred miles of his home, after April 1st, for his expenses. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER need not to be told that Mr. Irvine is intelligent and able and that he realizes the grave and imminent dangers which menace our constitutional rights and our religious and civil liberties.

BRO. C. H. GODDARD, of Dakota, is fast organizing his territory. E. C. WALKER.

A Good Change.

Wm. E. Coleman having resigned his position on the State and National Liberal League Committee in Kansas, caused by his removal to the Presidio, San Francisco, Cal., the vacancy on the National Liberal League Committee has been filled by the appointment of Prof. O. A. Phelps. Hereafter my post-office address will be Box 186, Wyandotte, Kan. E. CAMPFIELD, Ch. Ex. Com.

Local Liberal Leagues.

O. A. Phelps writes from Frankfort, Kan., February 2d: "Formed a good League here last night; J. Weisbach, President, and J. A. Weston, Secretary. I also had the pleasure of organizing a League at Arrington, Kan., February 15th, numbering twenty-two charter members. Plenty of material for future growth. R. A. Van Winkle, President; S. H. Quillon, Secretary."

Another League.

At Bear Lake, Mich., W. F. Jamieson organized a Liberal League of seventeen members, with Mr. D. D. Smith as Secretary. Doubtless the League will apply soon for a charter, as Mr. Jamieson recommended the members to do. Mr. Jamieson's next engagement is at Manistee, Mich. Address him there.

Liberal League No. 160.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We held our first meeting under our new charter for Hope (Kansas) Liberal League, No. 160, on February 14, 1880. Although we are a new League we are not new in the cause of Liberalism. We hav had a Freethinkers' organization for three years, and had over thirty lectures last winter by as good Liberal speakers as this part of the "fold" furnishes. We hav adopted a plan which we hope other Leagues which are older and more able than we are may adopt. It consists of a gratuitous donation from time to time for the benefit of the State Liberal League. I fail to see any other source of revenue to sustain the cause in the states. We hav put our shoulder to the wheel and it is rolling grandly. Let us not look back. Yours fraternally, MARTIN PEACE, Secretary.

Hope, Kan., Feb. 16, 1880.

Iowa Enterprise.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Liberal League of Northern Iowa has become a large affair, and is increasing every day. We now number into the hundreds, and a more intelligent and educated assembly does not meet than our League. We meet the fourth Sunday of each month, and the interest displayed is encouraging to the Liberal heart. We are too powerful here to be snubbed, and receive little abuse from bigotry. Occasionally a stranger in our parts assaults us from the pulpit, but not often. Yours for liberty and equality,

M. E. BILLINGS, Sec'y. M. FARRINGTON, Pres.

Hopeful Signs.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Some two years ago I gave the first Liberal lecture in Marengo, N. Y., that had ever been heard there. It was openly declared by some that they expected to see the Lord strike me dead for my blasphemy. But nothing of the kind occurred, and the only remarkable but quite natural incident connected with those prophecies and evil prophets was the arrest of one of them for stealing a pocketbook belonging to a young lady.

Since my first lecture I hav visited the place a number of times, and ventilated the old fables of mythology and inspiration. A few weeks ago while there I was surprised when invited to attend a debating-school, at which the question for discussion was, "Resolved, that Christian teachings do more harm than good." The debate took place as was anticipated in the schoolhouse. Some pious ones objected to having such a meeting held there, but a few men of character and influence came forward and said, "Very well; if you object to having debates in the schoolhouse, we shall object to having any more preaching there." The house was filled and the debate was interesting; and when the hour for adjournment arrived, a strong desire for another discussion was expressed, and the following question was accepted and disputants appointed: "Resolved that the teachings of the Bible are immoral." Is not this a hopeful sign, when Christianity is thus arraigned by public sentiment and challenged to make good its claims or quit the field? W. S. BELL.

An Open Letter to B. F. Underwood.

DEAR SIR: If you are correctly reported in the Chicago Inter-Ocean of December 10th, I need offer no apology for addressing you this "Open Letter," for it will not be expected of one of the "tag-rag and bobtail" supporters of Mr. Bennett to manifest any of those fine elements of polish for which the cultured Bostonians of the Abbot school are so eminent. I address you from the standpoint of one of the great army of human toilers who earn a living for themselves and families by constant, unremitting labor at the material productive industries, and who, after a hard day's work in the shop, factory, or field, hav little time to devote to the cultivation of the mind, especially in its higher, esthetic sense. We hav sought, as opportunity offered, to acquaint ourselves with the best known forms of government, to understand, as near as possible, our human relations and duties, and to perceive, without prejudice, what existed in the popular thought and action inimical to the well-being of our fellow-creatures. These acquisitions came necessarily from active reason, some reading, good listening, and constant observation.

We soon discovered that slavery, intemperance, and superstition were the "trinity in unity" that held "high carnival" at the expense of liberty, society, and reason—the first the "sum of all villainies," the second the reign of madness, and the third a poisonous mildew that turns to rottenness the best fruits of the mind and heart.

Perceiving how much happiness this human trio were destroying, we began to consider what weapons were most essential to counteract their evil tendencies. Action, action, action, rang in the ears of the soul with no uncertain sound. We must work, and that at once. The voice, the pen, the life, must tell the indignation we felt against these relics of barbarism.

We looked around to see who were the workers in this field, and saw at a single glance a goodly number of brave men and women. Who were the sturdy pioneers? The Garrisons, Kneelands, Motts, Owens, Hares, Davis, Theodore Parker, and thousands of others equally great. They used strong language, and they were called coarse, vulgar, blasphemous, and Infidels. Samuel J. May, in Garrison's early career, said to him, "Mr. Garrison, you are too heated, too intemperate, in your utterances." Mr. Garrison replied, "I must needs be, for there are mountains of ice to melt." As Mr. Garrison then felt, so feel all heroic souls when they realize the magnitude of the great crime against the race by the machinations of church and state.

Such being the facts in the case, you must not expect the class to which I belong to deal in cultured phrases like yourself. To this class Mr. Bennett belongs. Like Garrison, he calls things by their right names. He does not "equivocate, he will not retract a single inch, and he will be heard." This honesty offends your fastidious taste; this earnestness and bravery is a constant rebuke to your would-be sugar-coated affability; and the general, as well as generous, appreciation of these excellent qualities by very far the greater portion of the most staunch Materialists and Spiritualists is an offense you cannot forgive.

You find fault with Mr. Bennett's management of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Pray tell me how it happens that so many of the longest and true supporters of the Index prefer it to Abbot's paper—the more especially when they hav been so long under the inspiring influence of his and your teachings?

You can hardly feel flattered at the success of your highly polished and chaste style of assailing the popular evils against which the Index editor formulated such excellent "Demands."

What do you expect to gain by this pitiless warfare to injure an unarmed man, who to-day is suffering in a prison for the advocacy of principles you hav labored many years to propagate? You are too intelligent to believe your own assertion, or to hav any faith in the plea of obscenity. You know it will not bear any legal, intellectual, or moral test. His offense was his dead earnestness against mental tyranny and slavery in the name of religion. 'Twas this, and this only. Mr. Bennett's honesty is put beyond the peradventure of a doubt. He will not lie to save his reputation, to retain his friends, or to preserve THE TRUTH SEEKER—the almost idol of his life work. What a grand soul! It touches the highest altitude of heroism and moral rectitude.

Mr. Bennett is getting widely known. THE TRUTH SEEKER is well advertised by this new trinity, viz., the spiritual Bundy, the fastidious and chaste Underwood, and the immaculate Abbot. Thanks, gentlemen, thanks for your timely but unintentional aid. The friends of Mr. Bennett and his paper are legion. Their voices and purses hav the true ring. The National Liberal League is enlarging in numbers and activities rapidly, and the "unkindest cut of all" to the pure and immaculate Abbotonians is the resolve of cultured Cornell that they do not indorse what Abbot and Underwood say of those who supplanted Abbot by electing Elizur Wright as President of the League, "for they believe those that sustain Mr. Wright and the old League to be pure, earnest workers in the great Liberal field." Mr. Underwood, what has been the nature of your work? and what paper was your special organ? Regarding the first query our constituency are well posted. With reference to the latter, 'twas no less than the brave Investigator. You sought the destruction of Christianity, believing it to be a superstition that militated against the well-being of the human race. As regards your treatment of Mr. Bennett, the Investigator is against you. As one of the Liberal Spiritualists, I admired your ability, and thought, as I now think, that your work was a useful one; holding, as you did, that the Christian cosmogony of creation, its fall of man, scheme of salvation, and plenarily inspired Bible, are a tissue of the greatest absurdities possible for the human mind to conceive, that has produced as much mental degradation, and more sacrifice of human life, than any system of theology ever known.

We hav tolerated your, to us, very crude notions of human destiny, being willing to concede your honesty of purpose in the line you had chosen. In your debate with Ada Ballou, in Joliet, at which I took notes, you said, "as you stood beside the grave of your father, the thought was a sad one, that this was the end of life." We hav no such feelings. While standing by the bedside of my dying mother, and saw the sweetest smile I ever beheld play upon her features as her dear soul left the form, I was assured we should meet again in the higher walks of progressive life, where the unfolding of the powers that commence here will find ample fields for their enjoyment and cultivation. Your work, in part, was to destroy this hope, not perhaps intentionally, but by a process of reasoning that left no principle on which it might rest. I know you purposed to make this life sweeter, mankind more noble, reason more free, and human liberty devoid of all shackles that would mar true human happiness. For all this you had my hearty good speed, for I esteemed your labors fruitful of much good. "Credit where credit is due." To this same "tag-rag and bobtail," viz, the radical, uncultured, Spiritualistic workers of both sexes, whose pioneer labors throughout the land wrought such marvels for free speech and incisive thought, hav you been greatly indebted for your success. They cleared away much of the rubbish, agitated the pools of stagnant thought, and set people to thinking as they never thought before, bringing the names of Thomas Paine and his class of reasoners more fairly and squarely before the public, into the arena of honest discussion, in a single decade than your class of workers did in half a century. They enabled timid, polished, and cultured Unitarianism to show a bold front, bold enough to claim Theodore Parker as one of themselves. This is my definition of your position. Some years ago you told me that "much of your time was spent in discussion, and that the Campbellites were always ready for a debate." This necessarily drew toward you many warm and ardent friends. Their enthusiastic admiration of your abilities as a scholar and speaker added fuel to the flame of natural human vanity. In connection with this you were feasted and treated to the best in the fairest homes, and kept continually above the conditions common to the mass of the people, and were led to believe you were born to be a leader. This thought in due time assumed such proportions to the eyes of your distempered vanity that it led you to assume a kind of mental dictatorship. In this condition you fret and chafe to see how others of rougher but more unselfish grain outstrip you. Mr. Bennett wields a claymore, you an elegant poniard; he cleaves to the vitals, you simply irritate. Your pills are so sugar-coated that you expect the patient to swallow them without knowing it. All this truckling is the result of a weak personal ambition that has no place in the vigorous philosophy of the Investigator. To gratify this ambition you resort to means below and beneath your knowledge and natural good sense, were the latter free from the taint of selfish vanity. In all candor, which are preferable, Mr. Bennett's unpolished statements of truth or your varnished falsehoods? Mr. Bennett's manly confession of his mistake or your dogged persistency to maintain a wrong, under the guise of injured innocence and purity? His broad spirit of catholicity for those who differ from him in thought and their mode of expressing it or your fastidious taste of dictation and sweeping condemnation of those who are your peers in ability and superiors in liberal generosity? Your puerile threat and assertion that Robert G. Ingersoll and all other good people had left Mr. Bennett—which includes the "tag-rag and bobtail" with him—would not kill or frighten us were it true. Many of us had worked for years in this field before Mr. Ingersoll was known to the public at large. We gladly welcome him in his noble efforts in —to us—the right direction; in some others, especially finance, we think him weak and frivolous.

These ideas are as irresistible in their progress as the downward sweep of the glaciers; and whatever stands in the way of their movement will be swept aside or crushed beneath them. Ingersoll, Underwood, Abbot, and Bennett may help but cannot control them. All might die at once, and though it would be a source of regret, especially in the case of the latter, still the work would go on. By the process of mental and spiritual evolution the fittest truths would survive, which fact in itself should rebuke and prevent the growth of petty personal ambitions. My only desire is to work in the ranks of the toilers, and to liv in harmony with the principles of truth and equity as I understand them. As one who believes there is much good in your nature, and much useful ability in your usually clear brain, I would ask you to stop and ponder the situation, considering for a moment that you may be mistaken, and that the great majority of your true friends, who take exception to your present course, may be in the right. Be as brave as Mr. Bennett; dare to confess that in this erratic course and cruel tirade of narrowness you were foolish, and be assured that though Ingersoll, Abbot, and all your immaculate ones forsake you, we will not. Our arms wait for the returning prodigal, our hearts beat with the old love and tenderness; for, though coarse, we will not denominate those who differ from us as "tag-rag and bobtail," and will not charge even with Freelove those who disclaim it. Neither will we take up the clap-trap phrases of our enemies to misrepresent E. H. Heywood and that school of thinkers and honest workers. I will not forget how Mr. Heywood, immediately after he graduated, enlisted in the antislavery ranks, throwing the weight of his talents and labors in favor of the downtrodden slave. His nature is not an obscene one. His work, "Cupid's Yokes," is scholarly and philosophical; and though, like Mr. Bennett and yourself, I am a strong monogamist, I am not quite sure that any or all three of us could answer Mr, Heywood's argument. Till that time comes I shall deal in no condemnation, as better men than I hav had to change their opinions. Science herself occupies the shifting sands of mutability. The law of evolution carries away many of its cob houses; and until we rise above all narrowness of theological and scientific sects and the vanity of personal ambition, and occupy the solid position of willing learners at the fountain of truth, for truth's sake, we make a sorry figure in our claim to the title of upright Liberals.

Your sincere well-wisher, GEORGE LYNN.

The Changes of Time.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The population of all the world increases more now in twenty-five years than it did in olden times in a thousand years. We to-day liv under conditions never known until very lately. Only within a very few years hav we come to full use of steam, electricity, the press, etc. As a proof of how very different our life is from our forefathers' take our language. It is known that language tends to change rapidly. Thus let a people who talk the same language settle in half a dozen different counties, and hav no communication with each other outside of each county. In about three generations they cannot understand each other. The tongue of each county becomes different from that of the others. Even to-day the mass of the people of England cannot understand each other out of their several counties. People of adjoining counties that once used the same tongue, by remaining isolated from each other hav come to use a dialect different from each other. So in this isolated way hav all people lived until of late. But our country was settled so nearly to the new era that, though we hav spread over a continent, and hav incorporated with us many hundreds of thousands of different-speaking people, yet we use the very same words and sounds. Such is the enormous influence of the new conditions the world now livs under; and not only are people of the same nation growing homogeneous, but all the world is rapidly becoming as one people. In short, the measure of the difference between the new condition and the old is best shown by the fact that journeys which formerly required a month, delays and bad roads included, are now done in two or three days, while verbal communication is almost instantaneous. In labor and production of all important kinds there is the same difference between the old and new time. And we see that each improvement is merely like a step to higher planes where we can see the need and use for still more and obtain the means of making more. It would seem as though there is no limit to this progress. The impossible of ten years ago is attained, and still higher reaches made.

But we are merely beginning to employ the great discoveries. Time and cheaper modes will make all of them in common use. We scarcely begin to feel their influence on our physical life. Socially, politically, and morally we are living under modes of doing that were prescribed for the old conditions, and that are totally unfit for the coming man. They stand in the way just as monarchism and slavery did, only they are farther along in the way. It was the diffusion of knowledge that abolished absolutism in government in western Europe and the united colonies. Steam and lightning and mechanism abolished slavery here. He who twattles that 'twas religion and the Constitution forgets it was founded in a more religious age, and by the very authors of that Constitution. And what things do yet stand to be overthrown by the conditions now arising through the ten thousand new applications of steam, electricity, and other forces of nature, to every art and desire of man? Every institution, combination, privilege, monopoly, custom, statute, social caste, moral or religious ideas, every imagined thing that stands in the way of the universal solidarity of all the peoples of all the nations must perish. And yet there are always some persons who think the world was finished at certain times, and that government must last forever just as it is in their day. They think now that slavery was about the last evil, and since its end the millennium of perfection has come. They seem not to know that when new conditions arise old blessings clung to become positive curses. There never was a time in history when abuses swarmed us as they do to-day, and when institutions once framed for man's benefit and protection hav become means of most outrageous imposition and oppression. It is because we do not recognize this that we are drifting towards a time of tribulation such as has not been since the world began.

One of the things that offer the most glaring incongruities with new conditions is a legislative body composed of heterogeneous members in large numbers, having no limit to its power of enacting statutes (we will not call them laws), save the veto of another accidental person, or their own idea of the Constitution, that Constitution being a mere paper with no living voice to defend itself.

Many years ago, when no man hardly could read, and it took months to ascertain the people's will, it was necessary to giv a numerous representation in order to get at the people's will. But to-day, when every voter is a politician fully as intelligent as his representative, and the expressed will of the nation can be gathered in a few hours, numbers in representation hav become an absurdity. Moreover, it is a means of eluding responsibility, the congressman, like a juryman, being lost in the crowd. Irresponsible statute-making, proceeding under a dumb Constitution in a geometrical ratio, what must result? Anarchy. Not one-tenth of the representatives know or care what statute is enacted so long as they get their own particular measure through. The Constitution becomes in practice a nullity, or though all may know a measure is a violation of it, yet it becomes enforced the same as though it were lawful. Nothing but resistance and a suit in courts, where an indictment is ruin, and delays are endless, can nullify it. More and more courts must be made, of an inferior character, where judges appointed for political services are not generally above the ordinary justice-of-the-peace mark. Here, then, are all the dearest rights, liberties, conveniences, and comforts of all the people at the mercy of finally a body of inferior and irresponsible men. The dearest of man's rights, one for which our British forefathers fought and bled, the right of being tried in his county, or the "county of the fact," as they called it, has become annihilated. The rustic, once owner of his own home, is so no longer. If he has used a bit of bunting with the stars and stripes on it as an advertisement, or refused to reply to impertinent questions, as he may suppose, put to him by the first tramp that comes along, let him beware! He may be indicted for some offense and carried hundreds of miles and thrown into jail for want of bondsmen, and put to costs enough to sweep his little home from his title and possession. These two are cited out of a hundred possible cases of violation of United States criminal statutes. Even if acquitted there is no reimbursement for costs he has been obliged to pay in securing his witnesses' attendance. The result must be that the people become unprincipled, cowardly, revengeful, and unpatriotic.

And yet every criminal statute of Congress, except those to punish treason (as defined), counterfeiting United States coins and securities, piracy, crimes on the high seas, and offenses against the laws of nations, or in the army, navy, District, etc., is in direct violation of that Constitution, and so is null and void, or else words hav no meaning. Such acts are of no more lawful force than the resolutions of a village debating school. And so did the nation determine when Jefferson was elected. Even were the language doubtful, wherever before was there known to be a strained construction to create a crime, and that a crime of the mala prohibita order? When such things can be done by legislatures, courts, and executives, when statutes are enacted in violation of the prime law which declares them null, and they are contrary to the traditions of centuries of judicial proceedings which hav disfavored mala prohibita, either the people are too ignorant to know what has been done, or else their hearts must become full of loathing and contempt for the whole government. And such is now taking place among all the people. The forms of party action still operate, and elections are held, but the people are really coming to despise this government. Great wrongs done to individuals are reflected upon by the masses. The people are being educated in a direction that those who occupy the positions wealth givs them little suspect. Were we all determined to quiescence, yet events would shock and drive us. And events are created by those most interested in peace, by those whom the gods hav made mad for their own purposes.

CLARK IRVINE.

Liberalism.

A little less than a hundred years ago, and during the Reign of Terror in France, an inmate of one of the prisons of Paris commenced and perfected an undertaking that made his name immortal; but, like the majority of people who labor for the enlightenment and liberty of mankind, he went down to his grave amid poverty, contempt, and the maledictions of a majority of the people of Europe and America.

The prisoner was Thomas Paine, and his undertaking was that magnificent monument erected over the remains of bigotry, superstition, and religious intolerance of eighteen centuries—his "Age of Reason."

Viewed in the light of to-day, the work is regarded as a mild and conservative, but conclusive, argument against errors in theology and ignorant or wilful blundering in the translation of biblical history. The author, while denying the absolute divinity of the scriptures, had nevertheless a latent reverence for them, which is essentially wanting in the advanced Liberalist of 1880. While he proved conclusively that the priests of the orthodox Protestant and Catholic churches were teaching false doctrines and warring against reason and common sense, he appeared to regard their actions as errors of the head, and not of the heart. And yet the "Age of Reason" awakened the anger and resentment of ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people of the civilized world. It was met with abuse and vituperation instead of argument. Public opinion placed its author below the level of the vilest criminal, and only the disturbed condition of political affairs in Europe saved him from the vengeance of the church.

But from the advent of this little volume can we date the birth of religious liberty. For over half a century its growth was feeble, and it is only for the past ten or fifteen years that it has begun to approach maturity.

There are few among us who cannot recollect the time when the powerful Liberal element of America was in its feeble infancy, and there are few of us who were not at one time anxious to see its feeble life stamped out; and while we wonder to-day at our blindness, we hav no difficulty in accounting for the enmity we bore it.

There is nothing more difficult to eradicate from the human mind than the doctrines and traditions taught us during our youth. We then accepted as fixed and immutable facts every statement that came from the lips of those we loved and respected. The likes and dislikes of our teachers and favorite ministers were our likes and dislikes. We loved things which they professed to love, and cordially hated what they invited us to hate. It has been a settled principle with churchmen for generations to labor more in inculcating their creeds and dogmas in the minds of children than in those of mature growth, and to this principle can be attributed the strength of the orthodox church to-day; and your children and mine hav or will doubtlessly be induced to follow in the same beaten track that we hav traveled, and will go forth into the world filled with the same superstitions that were once ours, unless we, who hav, after years of religious slavery, emerged from our bondage, shall provide for them some attractions that shall counterbalance those of the hot-beds of the churches—the Sunday-schools.

There are few reforms that are at first popular with the masses of the people, and Liberalism has proved no exception to the rule. Hardly two decades hav passed since an Infidel was pointed out to the rising generation as an individual to be abhorred and avoided. Ten or fifteen years ago the man or woman that expressed a doubt as to the divinity of the Bible was ostracised from the society of church people, and the person who had the temerity to ridicule the manner in which an avowed savior was brought upon the earth was solemnly excommunicated from intercourse with his Christian neighbor.

And even at this time the proscriptions against the Freethinker are numerous and vexatious. While the social terrorism that was once used to hold him in check is no longer used by the more intelligent church people as an antidote for skepticism, there are yet on the statute books of the most of our states laws which are plainly intended as bulwarks against religious liberty and safeguards for bigotry and religious intolerance. Under these laws the Liberalist, while conforming, to all intents and purposes, to all the requisites of true manhood and to every essential feature that is needed to make him a worthy and useful citizen, is liable, at the will of his religious opponents, to arrest, trial, and fine or imprisonment.

It is true that the resistless march of progress and civilization has rendered these enactments partially obsolete, but they are obstacles in our path which it is our mission, as Liberalists, to remove. Free and untrammeled thought, and free and untrammeled action, within the bounds of reason, propriety, and the duty we owe to our fellow-men, is what we demand and what we will eventually secure.

As a member of your League, I hav no desire to war with churches, tenets, or creeds. I am willing to concede to every man and woman his or her perfect and unlimited right to believe in any dogma, superstition, or tradition; and while I may fail to approve of the judgment of those people who let credulity, bigotry, and superstition weigh down the teachings of common sense, philosophy, and science, yet I hav no right to judge their motives or doubt their sincerity. The most perfect liberty of belief is the unalienable right of every American citizen, and, as a Freethinker, I only ask of others the same rights, immunities, and privileges which I claim for myself. I hav only my own fallible judgment with which to weigh the motives and deeds of people of diverse views; and I am willing to subscribe to the doctrine of Pope when he says,

> "For modes of grace let graceless zealots fight;
> He can't be wrong whose heart is in the right."

There are not, probably, in all the individuals on this continent who profess Liberal views, a dozen whose opinions upon religious subjects are exactly alike, and the success of the cause does not demand it. We hav no desire to be trammeled by certain fixed and unchangeable codes like our neighbors of the various churches. Some of us are as hopeful of a future life as the most devout Baptist, Catholic, or Methodist; others hav no faith in a resurrection or well-grounded belief in an awakening beyond the grave. Some believe in spiritual visitations from the other world; others that such a phenomenon is a philosophical impossibility. But it is not for abstruse speculation on matters which are now, and probably ever will be, beyond the comprehension of the human mind that we hav banded ourselves together. Whatever may be in store for us in the future is beyond our knowledge, but the present is tangible and real, and the needs and necessities of the present demand our active labors. For eighteen hundred years mankind has been battling for heaven in a selfish, cowardly, and barbarous manner; to gain a promised paradise, it has sunk every generous, manly, and noble motive, and sacrificed its honor, integrity, and common sense. The duty which it owed to family, friends, and the world has been forgotten, and, in a blind and frantic scramble for a seat near the great white throne, it has left behind it much that elevates man above the brute creation.

Liberalism will within the coming few years effect a moral revolution. To eradicate from the human mind the errors and mistaken teachings of centuries is a gigantic task, but one that will eventually be accomplished. There is nothing in Liberalism which is calculated to secure the immediate admiration and approval of the ignorant, unreasoning, and unlettered, and among this class it will encounter the greatest opposition.

There is not, in all the various religions which are professed over the habitable globe, a single one which does not, in some manner, appeal to the lowest and most groveling tastes of its devotees.

Mohammedanism promises an unending paradise, where everything that can intoxicate the senses and gratify the desires of humanity will be offered eternally and without ceasing to those who die in the faith.

Buddhism teaches that its believers will eventually revel in untold riches and all the forbidden vices and pleasures of earth.

Catholicism and Protestantism hav provided for the faithful a vicarious atonement for those who want others to carry their burdens; a lake of fire and brimstone, in which those who desire to gratify their revengeful passions can see their enemies roasting and frying through all eternity; and a city built of gold and precious stones, where the miser, who is forced to leave his wealth behind him, can worship his idols for all coming time. And thus to the close of the almost endless list of diverse religious beliefs.

But the new dispensation promises nothing to the miser or voluptuary. It appeals to the reason and not to the passions. Its advocates hav started out on an educational mission instead of a fanatical crusade. It teaches men and women that they must bear their own sins and work out their own atonement. It teaches that a violation of natural and moral laws is no less a crime because the person who violates them does it under a religious pretext. It teaches that the barbaric and bloody customs of three thousand years ago should no longer be held up before the people of this age for their admiration and emulation. It teaches that there is a natural and philosophical reason or explanation for creation and every event that has occurred since the world began its revolutions; and it will eventually enlighten and reform the civilized world and crush out bigotry, superstition, and fanaticism under the stern logic of fact.

The assertion that the Liberalist is an enemy to morality, education, and the laws of his country bears its falsity upon its face. While human nature is the same, whether in priest or Infidel, and vice and immorality is by no means confined to any class, sect, or profession, we can honestly claim that among the hosts of speakers, writers, and laborers in the cause are the best educationalists, moralists, and humanitarians of the age—men and women who, instead of laboring to pilot a chosen few to a select and circumscribed orthodox heaven, are devoting their lives to the welfare and redemption of humanity at large.

Let our clerical friends call us Infidels, skeptics, Atheists, or any other name they choose, except bigots and fanatics. Twenty years ago we might hav shrunk from the epithets, but to-day we are proud of them. The time has come when every rational, intelligent, and thinking individual who has ever broken loose from the fetters of religious tyranny had rather be called an Infidel than a Christian, an Atheist than a trinitarian, and an emissary of the devil than a blind and senseless believer in a mythical savior.

Liberalism is not warring with anything that makes the human race better, wiser, or happier, but, on the contrary, is earnestly laboring to advance its intelligence and promote its prosperity and happiness.

Reforms, having for their object the personal liberty of mankind, hav been countless during the past few hundred years, and their originators hav justly passed into history as philanthropists and patriots; but in all the reforms which hav been chronicled during our modern days there hav been none which hav been calculated to develop the moral and intellectual portion of our being until the Liberalists and Freethinkers of Europe and America began to assert their manhood, and formed a solid line of battle against the further encroachments of religious humbuggery and clerical charlatanism. And it is the duty of those of us who are here to-day to form into line with our copatriots of other sections. Armies are made up of individuals, and victories are achieved by individual bravery, and in the battle which has now begun between intolerance, bigotry, and superstition, and Liberalism, progression, and enfranchised manhood and womanhood, let us each remember that individual efforts are necessary to make the victory summary and decisive.

My Mother.

How could I tread that hallowed plain
Where God and Christ and angels are,
Or how could heaven to me be gain,
Unless my mother were with me there?

If not in death, I would hav staid
Within the shroud which dead men wear,
Or, living, seek the willow's shade,
And hang my harp forever there.

Of what avail the victor's crown
Or the bright robes which angels wear
Unless my mother be all my own,
With me the bliss of heaven to share?

How could I join that wondrous throng
'Mid burnished crowns and burning thrones
And know her voice shall but prolong
Hell's dolorous, deep, and dreadful groans?

As Gog and Magog warred of old,
And from the palace in wrath were driven,
So would I storm its mightiest hold
And war's loud clarion blow in heaven.

I'd join some rebel angel throng
And powers omnipotent defy;
The shout of war should be my song,
To sound rebellion through the sky.

I'd tear that robe in every fold,
And count the rag as worthless clay,
I'd scorn the brightest crown of gold
And throw the paltry thing away.

Far down through space, where Satan fell,
On strong, immortal wings I'd fly
And share the deepest, darkest hell,
Or bring my mother with me on high.

Yes, dearest mother, thy every woe
On earth 'tis given me to share;
May God no other world bestow
Unless that boon be granted there!

Such my request let heaven record,
And angels the bright record keep;
And God to me nought else afford
Save worms and shrouds and death's cold sleep.

Letters from Friends.

GLENDALE, MON. TER., Jan. 25, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I might hav spared you this infliction, wearied as you are no doubt with so much personalities, were it not that I had a small remittance to make in order to begin the new year as square as possible, and had not seen anything in the paper from Montana in response to the invitation of Mr. Bennett for an expression of opinion in regard to this little unpleasantness. But what can I say more than has been said already by abler pens than mine? I cannot find words in the Queen's English to express my opinion different from those sympathetic friends pledging their fealty; for sake of brevity—miners, you are aware, are not experts in letter writing—will refer you, for my opinion, to the letter of Mrs. Denton and other advocates of fair play.

I hav watched with anxiety the verdict of Liberals. Now that they hav proclaimed unequivocally and with trumpet notes their disgust and abhorrence of the perfidy of Bundy and Abbot, and their determination to sustain the paper and the old martyr unjustly incarcerated and deprived of his liberty for the crime of fighting for your liberty and mine, to their verdict I giv my unqualified approval and indorsement; and what a deserving and fitting rebuke! How fortunate that the premeditated plans to break down the paper and build on its ruins the prosperity of the Index has so signally failed! That was a trite and true saying of yours, Mr. Macdonald, that the Index man is pre-eminently qualified for making himself despicable and hateful to all those having an appreciation of fair play. Duty to the public. Bah! Hid behind the veil of superculture, even at this distance, it is too transparent.

A word about that letter of explanation of Mr. Bennett's. I must say it was the most extraordinary production, under the circumstances, that I hav ever read; and a man heroic enough to write such a letter is made of sterner stuff than most mortals are. That letter, with its author, will go down to posterity by the side of him who drank the poisonous hemlock.

Next to striking a bonanza, the most gratifying thing to me was your "Account of Stock." That was a grand exhibit, showing the appreciation and good sense of the people in support of right and justice.

It is very gratifying, too, that the paper is so ably conducted in the absence of the old chief. True to its name, and retaining its usual force and brilliancy, no fear now that the truth will go down for want of public patronage.

Now, Mr. Editor, permit me to say in all friendship that the columns of your paper are not too large for all that might or could be said in vindication of Freethought and the freeing of mankind from the errors, myths, and superstitions imposed on them by a false education, and the exclusion of these by so much personalities seems to me (at a distance) like a waste of good material. It is to be hoped that peace and concord will reign hereafter.

I am endeavoring to extend the circulation of the paper, and find, after a little acquaintance, it is always a welcome visitor, but new subscribers do not always understand these personalities. There, now, I hav for some time "nursed my wrath to keep it warm." I hav had my say and feel better, satisfied that I can furnish good material for the waste basket.

Inclosed find ten dollars, and apply as per list.

I am, as ever, THE TRUTH SEEKER's devoted friend,

WM KINSELLA.

ANGOLA, IND., Dec. 2, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav read D. M. Bennett's reply to the cowardly attack of Bundy, Abbot & Co., and I must say that it bears the stamp of truth in every sentence. Bennett says that he erred in writing the letters which Bundy and Abbot are making such a cowardly fuss about; and he, like an honest man that he is, asks his friends to forgive him. Now I can only answer for myself, and as I am a friend to D. M. Bennett or any other man that is persecuted by Christian priests, I say Yes, Bro. Bennett; I forgive you from the very bottom of my heart; and I would say to every Liberal that livs on the earth, and especially to Liberals of this priest-ridden government, to forgive Bro. Bennett. In the name of humanity, in the name of everything that is dear to the liberty-loving people of America, forgive Bennett! I ask every reader of the paper to write Bennett a letter and tell him that he is forgiven. Think of the slanderous lies that hav been told by hypocritical priests about Thomas Paine, and then sustain Bennett and his paper.

Bro. Bennett, you hav done nothing to ask my forgiveness, but I forgive you all the same. Bro. Bennett, in the name of honest Infidelity, I forgive you. Yours,

C. H. WOODWORTH.

MCHENRY, ILL., Feb. 17, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed five dollars to pay for the paper and a copy of "Champions of the Church." I hav never subscribed for your paper, and probably should not now were it not for the virulent spirit that has developed, not only among professed Christians, but also among Spiritualists and Materialists, of malignant and intolerant persecution and misrepresentation of all who dare to publish to the world their best thoughts upon the social question.

If D. M. Bennett is justly imprisoned, Anthony Comstock should be in the penitentiary also. By the law under which he was convicted, it is provided that whoever causes to be sent through the mail any obscene book, etc., shall incur all the penalties of the law the same as he who actually mails it. Anthony Comstock wrote to Mr. Bennett to send him this book, and was the first cause of its being deposited in the United States mail. He believed it to be an obscene book; Mr. Bennett did not; therefore, I say, Anthony Comstock and all his privy counselors who caused Mr. Bennett to mail the book for which he is in prison are the only ones who ought to be there, and they only on the ground of conspiracy to get an innocent citizen imprisoned. If they believed "Cupid's Yokes" to be obscene, and they wrote for and caused it to be mailed, they should be indicted, tried, and convicted according to law, and not Mr. Bennett

I regard the whole proceedings against Mr. Bennett, and like prosecutions and persecutions which emanate from this puritanic clan, as the most outrageous judicial infamy that has disgraced the pages of American history since the death of Cotton Mather.

I shall always feel that an infamous robbery has been perpetrated under pretended forms of law, and that every person who sanctions the villainy is an emissary of the most diabolical, hypocritical, rotten-hearted clan of hyenas that ever disgraced the human form.

I am glad to be able to giv assurance that as far as I am advised among Spiritualists, it is only the gangrene of the body proper that is sloughed off that dissents from the main spirit of the sentiments herein expressed. I am glad also to know that in these views and feelings I am sustained by thousands of the best and ablest thinkers and writers, and that civilization is fast moving forward to the point where all will be wiser, purer, and better; will be more kind and humane, more considerate and respectable, and less acrimonious and vindictive toward each other, because of the ordeal through which the victims of intolerance hav been doomed to pass.

There is a sympathetic chord in the human heart that grows and strengthens with the progress of civilization, that ever beats in harmony with the oppressed and down-trodden brother or sister, and which is ever pointing to a higher and grander appreciation of individual rights.

With best wishes, yours truly, GEORGE GAGE.

WILMOT, OHIO, Feb. 15, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find seven dollars, three of which please place to my credit for the paper for 1880, fifty cents is for the paper for three months for F. Frank, and for the balance please send one copy of "Mistakes of Moses," two copies of "Sixteen Saviors or None," and one copy of the "Resurrection of Jesus;" forward all to the above address.

I received my TRUTH SEEKER of the 14th instant, and find a long letter from Mr. Bennett. I am very glad to learn that he is much better than he was when he wrote before. We may now hope that he will weather it through and do good service yet for many years to come. This will be sad news for the meek and lowly followers, such as Comstock, Cook, and Crosby; they will be sorry that D. M. Bennett is not crushed and Infidelity stamped out.

Please put me down for a copy of the book that Bennett is writing now in the Albany Penitentiary as soon as it is published. I want to do all I can to support the paper, even if it does subject me to the epithet of libertine in the estimation of the Pharisees. I hav faithfully observed my marriage vow for forty-five years, and mean to stick to it to the end of my life. Not much libertinism in that, nor Freelovism either. What they can make out of me for supporting Mr. Bennett and his paper I will let them (the Pharisees) judge for themselves, but I will do it, anyhow.

Respectfully and fraternally yours, JAMES ALLEN.

ELDORADO, IOWA, Feb. 12, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $3.50, $3.00 of which is for the paper for 1880, and use the 50 cents as you see proper for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

JOSEPH HUNTZINGER.

OREGON, MO.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Bad as is the statute under which Bennett, Paine, Foote, and a hundred others hav been selected to suffer, the partiality with which it is executed is worse. How mean and wicked it is to pick out a few men for prosecution and let others go! Lately I saw in Scribner's Monthly some cuts that none of us Freethinkers would dare send per mail. So I hav seen the like in Harper's Weekly. "Cupid's Yokes" I could leave on my parlor-table or read to ladies, but the "Yahoo" I dare not, yet Bundy advertises and sells it. I say nothing of the Holy Bible. Yes, it is plain that we are spotted and there is a conspiracy to crush us. CLARK IRVINE.

EUREKA, MICH., Feb. 12, 1880.

FRIEND MACDONALD: For one, I should not like to see D. M. Bennett step down and out unless it should be from that Christian institution. I think it would please Rutherford and Anthony too much to hav him step down and out. A long time after Hayes & Co. hav stepped down and out, and Bennett has done all the good he can and is well paid for the work he has done and the sacrifices he has made, then he may step down and out, not until then by my consent. I thought our fraudulency would hav released friend Bennett before this, but yet he holds him firm and is not much worried in his Christian mind about what he is doing. Well, about one year more and he will sit down where he belongs, and he will then hav time to study the matter all over and will probably see where he made a miss by letting Mr. Bennett go to prison. Four months is but a short time to me, and for the sake of our friend in prison, I say, Fly swiftly round ye wheels of time and bring the joyful day.

THE TRUTH SEEKER does not die worth a cent. Well, then, what was the use of sending D. M. Bennett to prison if you sons of Lucifer do not let it die, nor even get sick, but getting better all the time? That most be one of those Christian mistakes. Mistakes do happen in that family. If D. M. Bennett really thought he could spare the time and the stamps to write to a young lady, and it pleased her and himself and kept up the acquaintance and friendship that existed between them, what of it? I would not pretend to forgive or blame him for such a trifle. I can forgive him for much worse blunders than that when I know he has done so much to lead so many of us out of the house of bondage to this land of light and reason. But, dear friend, I hav detained you too long; I must stop.

Yours truly, P. S. TITUS.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Feb. 10, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: I believe this is my first attempt to write you direct since your inhuman imprisonment. But I do not wish you to infer that this seeming silence has been because I do not sympathize or think of you constantly and that I admire your true nobleness less because pretended Liberals and friends hav belied and joined your Christian persecutors in slanderous misrepresentations. I thought there were so many that would flood letters upon you that I would wait until your time might not be too much overburdened in reading letters.

My faith in you as a noble brother, as a defender of human rights, has been rather strengthened than weakened by the assaults of Bundy, Underwood, Tuttle, and Abbot. I regret your connection with those letters, but your manly way of confessing all has more than made amends. What can be more noble than for a man to confess his faults or acknowledge his errors? Few hav been the characters in all the ages past that hav done as much. I think it was a deep-laid plot on the part of Bundy and Abbot to do just what they did do. Being a Spiritualist and reader of the R.-P. Journal, I wrote to Bundy urging him to take a stand against your injustice at the hands of the church; I also urged him to lend a helping hand to influence all Spiritualists to sign your petition for pardon, but he replied by private letter that there was something that he wished to see me about when he should come this way on an editorial excursion train; but not being able to see him, I heard nothing more until his foul attack. I, with a friend, went to work and got two hundred and fifty names of our best citizens and all the Spiritualists on your petition; and I honestly believe that nine-tenths of all Spiritualists are with you to-day, at least all that comprehend the facts in your case.

I ceased to take the Journal the moment I realized Bundy's course. I regretted doing so, as I like to sustain Western journals; but the mean, dastardly course pursued toward you and your paper I could not sanction by sustaining its editor. I think the course that B. F. Underwood pursued toward you concerning those letters is unjustifiable. All true humanitarians should giv him as good a letting alone as Bundy and Abbot.

I hope that you will come out of prison with sufficient physical and mental vigor to rally all honest humanitarians around you and the cause you hav suffered for these long and wearisome months, and I feel assured that the race in the centuries to come will bless you as one of its benefactors and martyrs. I shall send five dollars to the office for papers and books, and I want your paper to liv to a good old age.

Yours for a free humanity, DR. A. B. DENNIS.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1880.

FATHER BENNETT: While I fondly hope you are now asleep, recuperating your exhausted energies to perform the duties to which you are assigned, I am sitting up, at a lonely hour of the night, thinking how I can send a word of comfort to cheer your heart and your monotonous prison life, which, no doubt, drags slowly and wearily with you; and if my will was law I should repeat the exact words ascribed to Jesus when talking to the woman: "Neither do I condemn thee; go in peace and sin no more." I do not wish to tantalize you in the least, knowing that you hav all the trouble that a poor, nervous old man can sustain now, but I feel impressed to tell you that you will be surprised when you come to learn the progress which the religious and also the scientific world has made since your incarceration, and that the world moves with increasing momentum, and you will be like the character in the old fable, "Rip Van Winkle." Yes, the world moves, and all the powers that be can't stop it, and the Christian world, both Catholic and Protestant, will yet liv to thank and bless just such "old fools" as you hav been, and will learn that you hav been to them a sacrificing friend, to whom most of them are now ungrateful. They will yet believe the truth that these middle-men, upon whom both Catholics and Protestants hav turned their guns, hav saved them both from having their own throats cut from ear to ear. This is a fact of which both sects accuse each other, and past history confirms it well, and whether you sink or swim, survive or perish, there is an army in the field that will "fight it out on this line," and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and the slowest thing for the Christian world to learn is the fact that we are opposing creeds, theories, and wrong, and not Christians as individuals; and when God sees fit to employ only honest agents to represent his cause, the strife is at an end, and the hypocrites will be nowhere. Be assured you hav my utmost sympathy, and my best wishes for your early release and your future welfare. A. H. WALKER.

TOM'S RIVER, N. J., Feb. 15, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your last letter from Albany was the best one yet by you, I think. I am glad you say, Ask for clemency from Rutherford no more. Poor old granny he is!—only a woman in pants, and a very poor specimen of one at that (I beg pardon of all womankind for the comparison, but I only mean in the matter of being the victim of some other person's whims, as too many women are.) Truly you are doing much for the cause of humanity while confined, and perhaps your forthcoming book may do as much good as did the "Age of Reason," which I believe was written while its author was also in prison. Indeed your paper is like a Fairbanks' standard scales, for by it a Hayes has been weighed, as well as numerous other useless products of this world, which hav been made to kick the beam when justice was the weights. Fraternally,

O. N. BANCROFT.

BURTON, Jan. 11, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Allow me to congratulate you upon your success in your new field of labor as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with which I am well pleased. There is at least half a dozen of us made happy once a week on receipt of your paper; but the times are so hard I can scarcely tell how I will be able to remain a constant subscriber. This money question seems to be a serious drawback to the Liberal cause. It is true there are some wealthy Liberals, but as a class they are too honest to grab for wealth. If my finances were better I would, most assuredly, for one, accompany brother Bennett on his journey and reception home. It would be a mountain of pleasure to me. I hope the Liberals generally will be on hand to escort him on his journey home. I would be pleased to learn that the procession extended from Albany to New York. I am always pleased to hear from friend Bennett, and admire the cause he so earnestly and elaborately defends. I hope he may come out of the Christian bastile in full vigor, able to wild a vigorous quill in defense of constitutional rights and intellectual freedom. Sincerely and fraternally yours,

JACOB REED.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Feb. 4, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I venture to call you friend, not by reason of any personal acquaintance with you that would justify me in so addressing you, for I, like many others, am an entire stranger to you, but not to the injustice of your case. Like them I am not insensible to the wrongs heaped upon the head of your venerable old age; like them I hav learned to sympathize with you and to realize the illegality of your conviction. I address you, friend, because you are the friend of those liberty-loving people who to-day, as for centuries past, bear the yoke of oppression, in sympathy with whose cause, as their noble advocate, through the columns of your valuable paper, you hav been seized and thrust into a dungeon like a nefarious felon, under a most fraudulent pretext of obscenity, trumped up by an infernal association of persecutors and inquisitorial tormentors for advocating the rights of American citizens, guaranteed to them by our noble patriots in the Constitution, who, for a full century past, hav mutually pledged their lives and honors for the freedom of their country. You hav been seized and cast into prison, fettered in chains forged by the blood-hounds of a Spanish Inquisition, who are strolling around in the livery of heaven, ostensibly serving the Lord, but in reality ruining the happiness of the human race—whose throne is based upon evil-doing and sustained by hypocrisy, who are wearing the cloak of religion to shield them in their wickedness. If to-day the sound of the trumpet were to gather the ashes of our noble heroes from beneath the walls of their silent graves, uprising in their completed forms, animated by the same impulse that led them then to victory, and were to behold the wrongs that are perpetrated toward American citizens, they would return to their cold tombs, blushing in utter shame for their country.

Cheer up, old fellow, there are bright days for you in the future; and although you hav been robbed of the privileges of a freeman, yet let it be a consolation to you in your present affliction that you are not deprived of friends, who are thinking of you with tenderness, and who are eagerly awaiting the time when you shall be restored to freedom, when you shall again breathe the air of liberty so dear to us all. Therefore, keep up your spirits; let not your courage fail you; you hav endured it bravely till now; bear it patiently henceforth, until the happy time shall come, which is fast approaching.

I inclose my check for $3.15, as my next year's subscription for a copy of your paper. It is, indeed, a small tribute to the many qualities vested in your valuable journal, which entitle it to the highest place within the compass of moral teachings, but I wish to assure you that it could never hav been given with a better heart. Should you consider the true sentiments of my heart I bear toward you (although inadequately expressed) worthy of the trouble to giv it space in your valuable paper, you may do so, as my desire is to be free, both in thought and expression, worthy of a cosmopolite. Yours in sympathy, I. ABRAMSON.

ROCKFORD, Jan., 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ, Dear Sir: The cause is progressing very well here, and we hav several good chances to meet the enemy. We hav a preacher here who has knocked the bottom out of hell, killed the devil, sat down on the total depravity doctrine, and has got the people all a thinking, and there is quite a shaking among the dry bones. The other three preachers are all down on him, but we all turn out to hear him and support him as well as we can. I find that your leaflets are just the things to silence them at our Red Ribbon Club meetings, when they get to talking about the Bible and their Christianity, and what they hav done for the world. They try all means and foul schemes to choke us off at the meetings, and lie about us, and I hav been sent to jail for ninety days for speaking at a meeting after I was called to order by the chairman; and when I was in jail a preacher came (Spence) to me, and, in the presence of three witnesses, made this proposition to me: That if I would pledge myself never to speak at a temperance meeting again they would get me out of jail and assist me to pay my fine, which was $28.25. I told them if I stayed there until I was rotten I never would go out on such terms; but I came out sooner than they expected, as a good friend came of his own accord and bailed me out, and carried it up to the Circuit Court, where it was nolle prosequied, and I hav made it hot as hell for them ever since, and they don't educate the people any more—don't even show themselves at any meetings outside of their churches.

I wish you would strike me off about five hundred copies of a chapter of an unpublished Bible found near this place, on the Rogue River. There is a family here called Hyde, who hav run the town heretofore. Their preachers' names are Gardner (Methodist) and Buck (Baptist). Here is the Bible chapter in question found:

"And there was a great cry and murmuring among the Fordrockites, who dwelt on the banks of the Rascal river, which flowed into the great Ticjes-ma River, which emptied itself in the Gan-i-mich Sea, one of the seas belonging to the States United; for the Thinkers Free and the people there never bowed the knee to any of the gods that The-make-every-thing-clean tribe had set up in their midst—had said, with one accord, We will not hav the Cattle-skins to reign over us any longer, for their ways are mysterious and their book-keeping crooked. But the Cattle-skins, who were the keepers of the treasures and storehouses, and the law-givers, said, We shall reign over you, and our Vegetable-raisers shall rule thy children with a rod of iron and break them in pieces like a potter's vessel. But the Thinkers-free and the people that had never bowed the knee to any of the gods that the Make-everything-clean tribe had set up in their midst said, with one accord, You shall not reign over us any longer, for they were no more as clay under the hoofs of the Cattle-skins, for they had a man in their midst who possessed the power to cast out devils, and they were no more afraid of the fierce wrath of the Cattle-skins nor the hell of the Vegetable-raiser. Then the Tistbab's ram stood forth and cried with a loud voice, and said, For four-and-thirty years I hav served my God and reigned over other tribes. I will reign over the Fordrockites. But all the people, with one accord, said, We will hav no Pharisee to reign over us. Then the Tistbab's ram lifted up his voice and wept. Then the Thinkers-free and the people that had never bowed their knee to any of the gods that the Twoists had set up in their midst shouted with a great shout, saying, Long live the man in our midst who possesses the power to cast out devils! And there was great rejoicing among them; but there was fear and dismay in the Twoists' ranks, for the Ram and the Vegetable-raiser were dethroned and the power of the Cattle-skins almost gone." (Here endeth the first chapter. To be continued in our next.) Yours truly, R. MCCLEAR.

RICHMOND, P. Q., CAN., Feb. 12, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Although only a trial subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER thus far, I take pleasure in informing you that, although not concurring with all the views expressed in your paper, yet I like the general contents of it better than any other paper I ever read, being just what it is represented to be—an out-and-out Freethought paper. And I fully appreciate your and Bro. Bennett's efforts to free the world from mental slavery and superstition. Bro. Bennett has my heartfelt sympathy for himself and family in the most unjust persecution to which he is at present being subjected, and I sincerely hope that he will be able to brave and weather the storm which is now nearly ended, when he will again hav the freeman's rights of wielding his pen in his own defense, hurling back at his slanderers the contemptible lies with which they hav defamed his hitherto unimpeachable character.

I join with the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in asking Bro. Bennett to again take the helm of the ship on his release from the enemy's power, not because I believe it to be mismanaged at present, but because I prefer to see the old veteran again at his post, with Bro. Macdonald as assistant as heretofore.

I shall always consider it a pleasure and a duty to do the utmost in my power for THE TRUTH SEEKER regardless of its popularity or unpopularity.

Inclosed please find two dollars, for which send papers to the addresses annexed as trial subscribers, and place my name on your books as an annual subscriber.

The editors of our two local papers here—the Guardian and the Standard—are both Liberal thinkers, and I suggest that you exchange with them. They hav received one of the notorious five thousand Indexes, and by exchanging with them you may perhaps help the cause in this vicinity.

Yours fraternally, G. GYMER.

CLINTON, IND., Feb. 10, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed herewith find $4.20, to be applied as herein directed. I hav received circulars from some Liberal lecturers who would like to come to Clinton, but I cannot attend to them, as I liv on a farm; but you might say there is in Clinton a very neat little Opera House, capable of seating eight hundred people, and I think the people here would patronize a Liberal lecturer such as Mr. Underwood or Mr. Jamieson, but don't think a Spiritualist would do well unless he could trot out some materialized ghosts. The owners of the building will let the hall and circulate the bills for one-half the gross receipts. There has never been a Liberal lecture delivered here yet, but to show you that there is Freethought in the community I send you a copy of the local paper, the Herald, by which to judge. Should some one wish to try it they may address N. C. Anderson or J. H. Bogert, Clinton, Indiana. Yours, JNO. H. RYAN.

ARRINGTON, KAN., Jan. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It seems strange that in the nineteenth century a man could be sent to the penitentiary on such a charge as that brought against you for circulating a treatise on marriage, yet such is the fact. I am a constant reader of your excellent paper, exchanging with a neighbor, yet I see suggestions by some in your paper which I am convinced if generally adopted by Liberals would be ruinous to the cause, such as joining our fortunes to Denis Kearney and the fiat greenback nonsense. That would never do. It would draw from our organization the very best thinkers and writers we hav. No men or set of men or government can by a fiat giv purchasing power to any commodity of no intrinsic value, and it is folly to talk about it.

At least all must acknowledge that it is an untried experiment. I see it said that all there is in it is for the government to make said piece of paper a legal tender for all debts and taxes, and it will answer the purpose of coined gold or silver or paper money now used, the latter being always a promise to pay. Fiat money is not. You might pay your debts that way, but after it had answered for that purpose you could not compel any one to take it for wheat, pork, or beef, or wherewith to clothe or warm yourself. It has done all it can do, and has become worthless, and if the government had no other kind of money it would hav no means of sustaining itself. It would be dissolved. Fiat money would be a more potent engine of destruction than Jeff Davis and his army. It has paid its debts perhaps, but it cannot afterwards buy a pound of beef or pork or flour, or a musket. Its employees, having no other kind of money, would be in a like condition, and a dissolution would be inevitable; indeed it would be the most successful treason that could be devised, in my opinion.

The Liberal cause is flourishing in this county (Atchison). I am of opinion that one-half at least of its citizens are true Liberals, yet there are not one hundred fiat greenbackers and Kearneyites in the county. My motto is to fight the myths and absurdities of orthodoxy and superstition, and take a sensible and obtainable stand in politics, and our rights and liberties will finally be accorded to us. It is by persistent effort for the right in the right direction that we shall win. Yours truly, R. A. VANWINKLE.

MURPHYSBORO, ILL., Jan. 21, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find post-office order for six dollars to renew our subscription to the paper for the coming year. THE TRUTH SEEKER is all right with us Liberals about here. The Index and R.-P. Journal are all wrong with us, and are never mentioned except to execrate them. Yours truly, C. A. MILLHOUSE, J. S. LONG.

RISING CITY, NEB., Jan. 21, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I used to think that America was the home where every person had a right to believe there was one God or two Gods or a hundred Gods or no God at all, and still be entitled to all the privileges of an American citizen; and that the oath of the person that did not believe in the Jewish God should hav as much weight in the courts as the oath of one that does believe in him. But how sadly I was mistaken! for the other day I and one of my neighbors had a little difficulty, which ended in a lawsuit. As I was about to be sworn, the defendant's lawyer objected to my testifying, on the ground that I was an unbeliever. Then he questioned me as to my belief. He asked if I believed in a Supreme Being. I wanted to know of him what shape it was in and where it was, but he could not tell. Then he wanted to know if I believed in the orthodox God that is worshiped by them. I told him that some worshiped one God and some another, and I wanted him to tell me which one he meant; but he could not tell. Then he wanted to know if I believed in a future punishment after death. I told him I did not. Then the justice of the court, whose head is not filled with superstition, but with sound sense, said that I might testify. Now, if we had had a Comstock for justice, what might hav been expected but the reverse, and my testimony excluded on account of my belief?

I would say to all Liberals to beware of Comstock. If the old fellow is not in your county, probably some of his imps are.

If there is any Liberal speaker in this state, I should like to hav him come to our town and giv us a course of lectures and we will try to amply reward him for his trouble. I think there could be a League started here, for there are quite a number here that hav a Liberal spirit in them. If there are any Liberals in this state that would like to correspond with a brother for the purpose of giving him courage in the good cause, please let them write to me and I will be very thankful and will try and write to them.

Please find inclosed one dollar, for which send me the book, "Sixteen Saviors or None."

Yours, for equal rights, HENRY REINHEIMER.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., Jan. 29, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I feel very thankful for the kindness you hav manifested towards me, in sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to me so long after my year's subscription had expired. I am glad to be able to send you $4 00.

I anxiously watch every paper, hoping each week to hear of Mr. Bennett's release.

It is very evident to my mind a government that makes laws to allow any subject thereof to hav the power, no matter how obtained, merely from revenge, as in Bennett's, case, to incarcerate any one whom they choose, is not a government for the people, but for a few. A government that enacts laws which can place any citizen thereof where he is deprived of the bounteous gifts of nature so freely bestowed upon all, viz., the warm sunshine, pure air, and light; to disenable them to filfil their duties of life, is surely wanting in its structure. Yes, truly we need THE TRUTH SEEKER and just such a man as D. M. Bennett to be at the head, to send the missiles of truth home to all creeds, dogmas, and superstitions. If D. M. Bennett is to be condemned and put down merely for making a mistake in life, then what chance is there for those who may hav made more than one. I, for one, am glad to let him try again, and will forgive seventy times seven rather than kick him now, while in a felon's cell. The difference between Mr. Bennett and his enemies is, they will not confess their faults; but that is no reason why they are without faults or hav never made any mistakes in life.

I like your bold, manly spirit, that is ever manifested in sentiments that the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER ever proclaim. Giv us the truth, even if it probes the tenderest wounds and sores with a two-edged sword, showing us we hav that in us which limits us in our growth so we cannot come up higher. I, for one, wish to see myself as others see me, if possible; to grow large enough to giv others the same rights I ask for myself. I had rather suffer wrong than do wrong to others. Hoping that you may come out prepared to work for truth, justice, and liberty, I remain,

Your friend, MRS. M. E. ROCKWELL.

LONDON, MO., Feb., 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As the time draws nigh when Mr. Bennett will be liberated, wouldn't it be well to make arrangements to meet him at the bastile and escort him, in a manner befitting the occasion, to his home. I should like to be one composing a vast concourse of friends to greet the hero of the ninteenth century, to shake hands with the old martyr to human liberty. Let there be a procession formed (if Comstock will assent), and with no other banners than the national flags upside down, march through the streets of the city. Let it be a time of general rejoicing.

I liv away out West, but wherever civilization exists there will be found advocates of free thought, free mails, and Infidelity. Considering the population, we are numerically strong. We hav one flourishing League and are only waiting the advent of some good lecturer to organize another. I would like to advise all Freethinkers who contemplate coming West to locate in this county. It will be but a few years till we hav a majority, and already some of the Christians are threatening to migrate. The county papers opened their columns a short time ago to the discussion of Freethought, but the clerical champion, getting the worst of it, squealed, and his friends interfered, and by threats forced the papers to stop the fight. This is an Infidel community, but a Presbyterian minister occasionally looks after our spiritual welfare, but in his sermons he has entirely ignored and denied the existence of a hell. We hav educated him up to a higher standard of thought. We can educate the people by first educating the clergy. The more eminent a minister becomes the more liberal he is. I don't want it understood that I include Joe Cook in the roster of Liberals. If Joe ever gets ideas enough into his conch-shell to approach Infidelity, it will be after he has gone through another course of theological training in an insane asylum. Our friends are taking many Freethought publications, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is well represented and we intend to run after no false gods, such as Abbot and Bundy, but stick to Mr. Bennett as long as he givs us such exhibitions of his honest and true courage.

Yours for freedom, GEO. W. MAY.

A Challenge to a Christian Paper.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN STATESMAN, Sir: I hav seen an extraordinary letter in your columns on the character of Thomas Paine. How much better it would be for both your paper and your correspondent to hav refuted Paine's arguments instead of abusing him. I can assure your correspondent that the letter contains the germs of its own refutation within itself. I will allow the letter to be genuine, and all the slander Paine's enemies hav written against him to be true for the sake of argument, and I will prove from Christ's friends that Christ is a far worse character than Paine. Yours faithfully,

FRANK MAUDSLEY.

CONSERVATIVE AND PROGRESSIVE MINDS BOTH WANTED.—Minds that affirm and minds that deny, minds that construct and minds that destroy, live and work next door to each other. Which of the two classes you and I belong to, in our day, is a matter that depends not over-largely on our wills. It is a matter of temperament, of education, of circumstances, rather than of will. One man can hardly help being a doubter; another is predestined for belief. What are your instincts—to accept or to examine? is the first question. What sort of intellectual atmosphere hav you been bred in? is the next question. What sort of experience hav you had—the kind that makes you cry, "How beautiful it is to be alive!" or that which makes you ask, "Is life worth living?" is the next. Then comes the question, Hav you treated your mind fairly, done what you could to affect the biasses of temperament and narrowing conditions and yet, in the liberation, to keep yourself from other biases and from reactions beyond the line of reason? Whichever class you belong to—the constructors or the destroyers—it is well to remember that the other class is not to be greatly blamed, then, for being the other! and again, that it is well for the world that there is the other. If all affirmed, where would the new truths come from? for universal affirmations would pretty surely be acclaims of the moment's orthodoxy, and the moment would then lengthen to the century. If all denied, where were the stability that steadies the generation and organizes the truth already reached into moral instincts and ever-sure ideals.—W. C. Gannett.

Answer to "Sweet By and By."

BY WM. J. GORSUCH.

You may sing of the sweet by and by,
Of the meeting on death's farther shore,
Of those blissful retreats when we die,
And the turmoils of earth life are o'er.

CHORUS.
But I sing of the now,
And the brightness this life holds for all,
But I sing of the now,
And the brightness this life holds for all.

Why neglect ye the joys of this life,
For futurity's unknown "to come;"
Ye indulge here in fierce, bitter strife,
Yet expect ye a bright, heavenly home,

CHORUS.—For I sing, etc.

Why not liv ye in love's circling arm,
And let brotherly care fill your heart;
Drive away thoughts of hardness and harm,
Then ye'll know not sin's unending smart.

CHORUS.—For I sing, etc.

When, in this life, the long parted meet,
And pure love in their hearts reigns alone,
Think you not their delight is as sweet
As the joys of that untried "unknown."

CHORUS.—For I sing, etc.

Christ and Christianity.

This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read.

ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."
ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The book contains 446 pages, with a very full Index and table of content. Price $2.00.

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Right of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15 00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams. Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations. Forms for Organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-Laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 525 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected, for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Over 580 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents, in cloth.

Tillotson, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, W. E. Copeland, Horace Seaver, John W. Truesdell, and several other persons. Price, cloth, $1.25.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.). $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Uranology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

BY

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that have been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You have done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well. JAMES PARTON.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to have answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to have met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History.

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $2.00.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is love, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1.50.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against hi passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that it should "assist" also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address and the famous articles of Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson ON PRAYER.

With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist, Prof. H. HELMHOLTZ.

Paper, 12mo, 105pp., 25 cts.; cloth, heavy, tinted paper, 50 cts. Inaugural and portrait only, 12mo, paper, 69pp., 10 cts.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

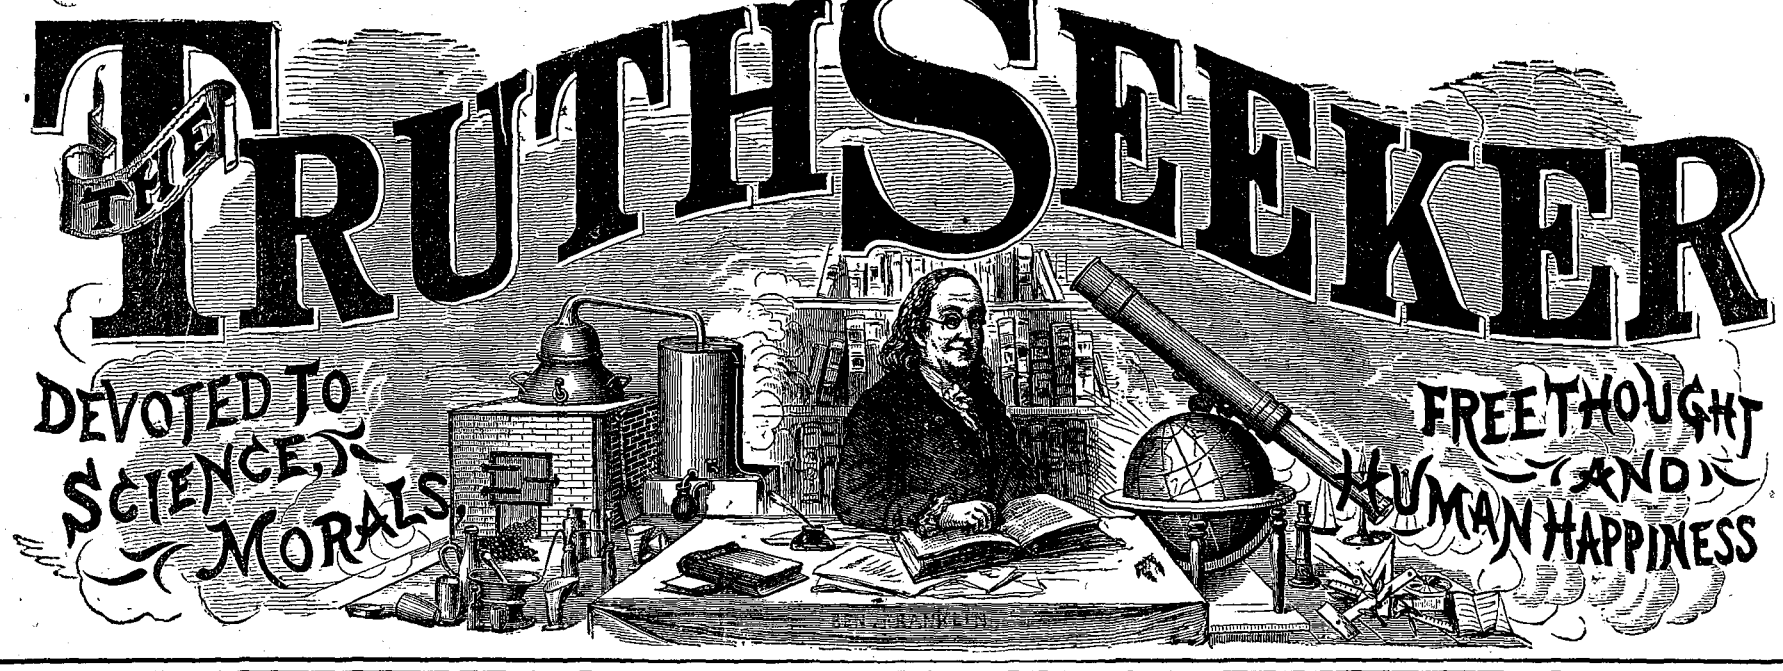
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.



3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petition is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibiy directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this le sson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

A. J. HAUCK is organizing a Liberal League in Altoona, Pa.

LIBERAL LEAGUE 171 has been chartered at Smithville S., Long Island. Secretary, George Jepson.

"THIS is arrest I hav not been longing for," was the comment of a weary thief when he was finally run down.

THE Bishop of Kilmore and the Archbishop of Armagh, Ireland, the heart of the famine district, hav sent five thousand dollars to the Pope as Peter's Pence. Comment is unnecessary.

THE Rev. A. J. Kirk was giving satisfaction as pastor of a United Brethren Church, at Kansas City, when his usefulness was suddenly destroyed by the news that he was a fugitive bigamist and swindler.

THE consciousness that you are right will make you happy even when all the world thinks you wrong, and the consciousness that you are wrong will make you miserable even when all the world thinks you right.

A EUROPEAN professor has issued a book containing seventy photographs of hell and its inhabitants. That's the way it goes, the devil is always ahead in advertising. Nobody has made a book with authentic pictures of heaven.

A GANG of nine highway-robbers, burglars, and horse-thieves were recently arrested in Bellefontaine, Ohio. They were all young men, of the best families, church-members, very pious, and had been reared under church influences. Their preacher must hav been a Crosby or a Cook.

JOSEPH COOK once remarked that "the aggregation of bioplastic germs evidences an irresistible tendency to correlate the molecules in inverse ratio to the capillary process of differentiation." "If you say that again," said the person addressed, turning pale with anger, "I'll knock you down!"

LIKE Brother B., of Pokomoke,
And Brother T., of Ho-bo-ken,
He kissed no aged women-folk,
And never, never kissed the men.
He chose the comely dame and miss—
Then why should people gossip so
About the merely social kiss
Of Brother Lane, of Kensico?

A VICTIM of domestic infelicity, who is in the habit of dreaming, should never go to sleep in church. A congregation near Quincy was somewhat startled last Sabbath when a venerable member excitedly yelled: "Here, now! drop that skillet, old woman! If you throw it at me, I'll jam your old bald head agin the wall till you think its a lodgin' house for shootin' stars!"

KISSES of "Christian affection" are creating trouble among members of the clergy who indulge in them. Another Methodist preacher at Arlington, New Jersey, is on the "ragged edge" in consequence of a too frequent repetition of these purely Christian evidences of affection for a lady member of the flock. The "disease" is becoming epidemic among the dominies, and the question will soon be asked, What shall we do with our preachers?—Lake City Sentinel.

THE stupidest man in Maine is a farm-hand near Lebanon. He was hired to plow a ten-acre field, and his boss, wishing him to draw a straight furrow, directed his attention to a cow grazing right opposite, telling him to drive directly toward that cow. He started his horses, and the farmer's attention was called to something else. In a short time he looked around to see what his hired man was doing. The cow had left her place and was walking around in the field, and the hired man following her, drawing a zig zag furrow all over the field.

MR. C—— was pastor of a Baptist church in a certain town in one of the Western states. He had been on very bad terms with some of his flock for some time. They abused him whenever they could find occasion, and he reciprocated with equal readiness. Before his contract with the parish expired he received an appointment as chaplain of the state prison. Elated at this lucky opportunity of getting rid of him, the congregation came in full numbers to hear his farewell sermon, perhaps less to compliment than to annoy him with their presence. Great was their astonishment and still greater their anger when the reverend gentleman chose for his text the following words: "I go to prepare a place for you . . that where I am, there ye may be also."

THE Deadwood Pioneer offers the following inducement to young men of the Hills to attend a meeting for the purpose of forming a church society: "All the girls and young ladies in town, but none over eighteen years old, are to be there, are requested to be there, are urged to be there, to organize a perfectly lovely society. Its object is to giv one or more entertainments, literary, musical, dramatic, and social, with a sprinkling of tableaux, and perhaps quadrilles, to raise funds to buy a library for the Congregational Sunday-school. With the array of 'endearing young charms' and radiant young charmers already enlisted in the movement, it is bound to succeed. In the bright lexicon of such lovely youth there is no such word as fail. We wish it understood that we are under eighteen for all practical purposes."

A MAN whom the Red Wing (Minn.) Advance calls "our great and Reverend B. J. Muss," is in the courts of his state, charged with cruelty to his wife. He is a man so pious that he will not allow his children to attend a secular school. Examination has brought out the fact that he appropriated $1,000 of his wife's money, put it out at interest, and pocketed the income. Although possessed of property to the amount of $30,000, he has for the past few years allowed his wife but $15 per month for the support of herself and a family constantly increasing in size. For a time, by teaching music, taking in sewing, etc., his wife managed to get along. Recently, however, she had the misfortune to break her leg, which, combined with chronic diseases superinduced by the cruelty and brutality of her husband, has forced her to seek redress in the courts. The place for this "great reverend" is with Cowley, of the "Shepherd's Fold."

THE Rev. Edward Cowley, the keeper of a wolf's den in New York called the Shepherd's Fold, where he starved children to death and otherwise maltreated them to an extent that outdid the cruelty of Squeers at Dotheboy's Hall, has been tried for his awful crimes, condemned to a year's imprisonment and fined $200. Another man, D. M. Bennett, has met with the same punishment for simply exercising his right to send a philosophical pamphlet through the mails. But Cowley was a mouthing Christian parson, who mumbled his prayers every day over the children he starved and worked to death and to idiocy, and Bennett was an impious Infidel who did humanity service by denouncing such sanctimonious scamps as Cowley. That makes a great difference. Justice demands that Cowley be hung or imprisoned for life for murder of the most cold-blooded and heartless kind, and that Bennett be released and liberally compensated for what he has suffered. It is not strange that hardened criminals in the jail where Cowley was incarcerated shrank from him as a monster of wickedness too vile for them to associate with. We need a Dickens to portray Cowleyism in this country.—Winsted Press.

ERNEST RENAN, who is to deliver a course of lectures in London very soon, has made as many enemies by the expression of his opinions as any author of his time. Like many other Frenchmen, he began life as an earnest Roman Catholic, and has grown into a pronounced Rationalist, which has naturally arrayed against him all the forces of the church. He is a Breton having been born at Treguier, the son of a sailor, and his young life was passed in indigence and obscurity. Naturally reverent and pious, his bent was strengthened by the priests who had charge of his early education in his native town. He was so influenced by them that he decided, when in his twelfth year, to enter their order as soon as he could qualify himself. At 16 he went to Paris, where he entered the seminary of the then Abbe Dupanloup. He afterward completed his philosophic studies at Issy, and continued his course at St. Sulpice. Culture and mental expansion had had a natural, though unanticipated, effect on his opinions, which had meanwhile grown too heretical to admit of his following his former sacerdotal bent. His acquisition of the Semitic languages, on which he prepared a memoir, and for which he gained the Volney prize, had been particularly instrumental in confirming his skepticism, and he expressed in brilliant fashion many of his altered views in his periodical called "Liberty of Thought." He wrote much and ably for the "Revue des Deux Mondes" and the "Journal des Debats," published translations and essays on various subjects, and was sent, in his 37th year, by Louis Napoleon, to Syria and Phœnicia, which resulted in several learned and eloquent volumes. He was elected, on his return, to the chair of Hebrew in the College de France; but his opening lecture was so pregnant with rationalism as to alarm the faithful, and, ultimately, to bring about his removal. Why a man's doubts about mere dogmas should incapacitate him for teaching Hebrew, dogmatists alone can apprehend. Renan's utterances had become more and more offensive to the Roman church, and when he gave to the world his "Life of Jesus," all its thunders were launched at his devoted head. No work of the time has, in all probability, caused such an agitation. Controversialists of every hue and pattern fell upon it; thousands of articles, pamphlets, and volumes hav been written to refute and condemn it; it has, literally, been damned to everlasting fame. The "Life of Jesus" is one of a series of works, still incomplete, on the origin of Christianity. Renan will be 57 this month. He is one of the most amiable and benevolent of men, one of the ripest of scholars, and a generally admitted master of French prose.

HERBERT SPENCER is better liked as an author, and his philosophy is more appreciated, in this country than in his own. Many Americans hav visited him in England, and he is on intimate terms with some of our leading scientific men. As he is a thorough-paced Democrat, there is much sympathy between him and our people, intellectually and politically. A London correspondent, who has just been taking his personal and mental photograph, puts it in ink for the benefit of his readers; Spencer has a calm, pale face, rather large features, a very high, partially bald forehead, thin, dark-brown hair, streaked with gray; slight figure somewhat bent and suggestive of delicate health, from which he has been a life-long sufferer. He talks very well and fluently, having none of the national hesitation, on a great variety of subjects, and in a positive, well-nigh dogmatic manner, indicative of a man whose opinions are not to be altered. Strangers complain sometimes of his abruptness, of a certain want of tolerance; but his friends find him uniformly amiable and courteous. He keeps careful trace of the history of thought, and of the radical views he entertains. He has been impressed with the wide acceptance of the doctrines of evolution in Italy and Russia as compared with Germany, which claims to be eminently the land of ideas. He ascribes the fact to the reaction in the former countries from what he terms the superstition of orthodoxy. He is now nearly sixty; is the son of a teacher, a profound mathematician, by whom he was chiefly educated, and the nephew of Thomas Spencer, a clergyman of the established church, noted for his liberal opinions on political and ecclesiastical topics. At 18 he became a civil engineer, but surrendered his profession after eight years on account of the extraordinary competition caused by the railway mania in Britain at that period. He has been very poor; his books hav a small sale in England, though a considerable sale in the United States, but he has recently been rendered independent in a very small way by a modest legacy left by a distant kinsman. He is a bachelor, and resides at Bayswater, London, where he spends his mornings in literary labor, dictating mostly to a regular amanuensis. In the afternoon he usually goes to the Athenæum Club, a favorite resort, and plays billiards for recreation. In the evening he often meets Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Carpenter, or some other member of the philosophic sect, with all of whom he is on close terms of friendship. He feels a deep interest in politics of the larger sort; is substantially at one with Gladstone and John Bright, and earnestly opposed to militarysm and every form of "jingo." He is not radical in all things, however, particularly not as to woman's rights as ordinarily understood. He holds that the general adoption of evolution will eventually do away with theology as at present taught; that while there is an unknown and unknowable beyond human knowledge, it is vain to speculate in that shadowy domain.—*N. ## The Godly Women of the Bible.—Continued.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE 19TH CENTURY.

JEZEBEL.

A noted woman is introduced in 1 Kings, xvi, 31. She is not called a godly one by the sanctified, because in all her injustice and crimes she worked against the success of God's chosen people instead of in their favor, hence she is accursed, the name Jezebel being a synonym of wickedness even unto this day.

It will be remembered that in our review of godly women, it has been found that those women, as well as men, who assisted the Lord in taking care of the Hebrews, fighting their battles, destroying other nations or individuals who, in most instances, had never done them any harm, were always commended and blessed by the Lord, no matter how much they had violated all human rights, abused the confidence of friends, and stained their hands with innocent blood. We therefore find Rahab, the harlot, commended for her treachery to her own people, rewarded for not delivering up the Hebrew spies, lying, deceiving, and falsely betraying her own nation into the hands of the most bloody cut-throat fillibusters on the face of the earth, till they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox and sheep and ass, with the edge of the sword. (Josh. vi, 21.)

Now this was all right, as represented in holy writ, because the Lord's peculiar people must needs go up and possess the land and destroy all the fenced cities and the inhabitants thereof in order to make a place for their holy selves.

Hundreds of instances similar may be found scattered through God's Word equally revolting to the finer feelings of humanity and opposed to the claims of justice as meted out by one human unto another, or as existing between nation and nation, destroying all that keen perception of right and wrong which we should be so anxious to cultivate.

With this preface to explain why we introduce the infamous Jezebel among the godly women, we proceed, asserting if it is right to deceive, lie, betray, murder, and confiscate for God's people and for God, it cannot be wrong for the opposite side to use the same means to baffle their foe and endeavor to conquer, for the question yet to be settled is, Who are God's people? and who is this cruel God who is the instigator, prompter, and rewarder of all the crime and wickedness recorded in the Bible, and at the present day defended by men not a whit better than those who then massacred innocent babes in the name of their Jehovah God?

Although the Lord seemed not to be in the least angry at Moses for marrying a Midianitish woman, at Boaz for taking Ruth, a Moabitess, for a wife, nor at Salmon, his father, for giving him (Boaz) Rahab the harlot, a foreigner, for his mother, and many other like cases, yet his anger waxed hot and he was very furious because Ahab, king of Israel, took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of the king of the Tidonians, because instead of sacrificing to Jehovah she persuaded Ahab to make a grove, or in other words, to go to meeting with her instead of her always going with him, the king. Therefore it is declared that Ahab did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that went before him. A pretty excitable God that! We wonder if he could not have cultivated patience and displayed a more unselfish spirit than to have become so rantankerous at such a trifle as Ahab's offering a sacrifice of a morning or two to Baal, instead of to his own mighty jealous self.

Now this Jezebel was fighting for her religion and her god or gods, the same as were Israel and the prophets for their favorite. She was a king's daughter, and the wife of the king of Israel.

Jezebel to effect her purpose cut off the prophets of the Lord (1 Kings xviii, 4), all but one hundred that Obadiah had hidden in a cave and fed with bread and water. Now Elijah at this time was performing his wonderful feats of rain-preventing and rain-sending, and seems in his egotism to have forgotten the hundred prophets hidden by Obadiah, for we hear him boasting (verse 22), I, even I, only remain a prophet of the Lord.

Baal's prophets were four hundred and fifty men that ate at Jezebel's table, and Elijah proposed to have a trial between himself and these four hundred and fifty men, so he had them all gathered together, and when they cried unto their God to come down with fire and consume their sacrifice, "nary he came," though they begged and prayed from morning till night. Elijah taunted them with "Cry aloud; for he is a God, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked." (Wonder if these are the reasons the Christians' god does not answer their prayers.)

When evening came Elijah built him an altar, and laid his bullock thereon, and no fire, and ordered four barrels of water, thrice repeated, to be poured on the wood, till the water ran round the altar and filled the trench (perhaps the so-called water was petroleum), and then the fire of the Lord fell and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. Pretty hot fire that. Did it not come up from below and not fall from above? It must be that Elijah played a trick on them. Petroleum alone could account for such a manifestation amongst the mediums of to-day, by Christians, and as they judge the prophets of to-day so will we judge the mediums of the Bible.

Well, now, that manifestation made a clean sweep for Israel and destruction for Jezebel. God had beaten Israel, sure as Genesis, and so the people fell on their faces and yelled out: "The Lord he is the God! the Lord he is the God!" never once suspecting any fraud in this superannuated medium 900 years before Christ!

This "tiger" was the signal for a universal massacre. Elijah, flushed with success, and ambitious of power, exultingly commanded: "Take the prophets of Baal! let not one of them escape!" And Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there. If he killed one a minute it would have taken him six hours and forty minutes to have performed the job, and thrown them into the brook; or was the brook used for the washing of his hands? Maybe the people did the killing, he only by proxy performing the praiseworthy deed.

Ahab seems not to have had any objection to this slaughter, it appearing by the record that he associated the drought with God's withholding rain as a judgment, because of Baal's prophets. But not so Jezebel. When her husband told her what Elijah had done, she sent a messenger to Elijah, saying, "So let the gods do to me, and more, also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time." So this man of God, this mighty prophet, who could raise the dead, prevent or cause rain by prayer, and call down the fire of God, instead of using his wonderful powers in this instance to set on fire his enemy, Jezebel, just like any common man fled into the wilderness a day's journey and "squatted" under a juniper-tree, forgetting all about his late exploit, asking this mighty God to take his life! An angel came and baked a cake for him on live coals in his sight, and on the strength of that angelic biscuit he went forty days and forty nights! Have courage, ye mediums of the present day, when starving, for the Christian Bible is on your side.

Now, Ahab was an unjust man and a cruel king, but as his injustice and cruelty was not in favor of the Lord, the Lord did not like him. He desired greatly a vineyard near his house, belonging to Naboth, and offered to purchase or exchange with him. Naboth refused to part with his vineyard on any terms, because he had inherited it from his fathers. Ahab, though king of Israel and Samaria, took it greatly to heart, lay down, turned away his face, and would eat no bread. His wife, Jezebel, questioned him, and learning the facts, declared, "I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth." So she wrote letters in Ahab's name and sealed them with his seal, proclaiming a fast, and that Naboth should be set on high, and charged him with blasphemy, through two men, sons of Belial, and he was stoned to death. Then she said to Ahab: "Arise and take possession of the vineyard of Naboth;" and he did so.

Now up springs Elijah, the Tishbite (of course, the word of the Lord came to him), with a malediction against Ahab. The man who had butchered in cold blood four hundred men was just the sort to be affronted with such an outrage as Ahab had perpetrated on one man through the instigation of his wife. He could afford to be very valiant in the service of his bloody God. Hear him: "Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou killed and taken possession? In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine." He continues with terrible anathemas in the name of the Lord, declaring that God will take away thy posterity and cut off from Ahab . . . and that the dogs shall eat Jezebel. But finally, when Ahab humbled himself, God caved in a trifle, and said he would not bring the evil in Ahab's day but in his innocent son's day.

The succeeding chapter (xxii) is one of the most interesting in the infallible inspiration. Therein is recorded, "Behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these, thy prophets" (Ahab's prophets; four hundred of them; see verse 6, notwithstanding Elijah had slain them all in chapter xviii. What a brood, hatched out in seven years, without even a nest egg to hatch from!) And also Ahab is killed, as predicted by the one true prophet against the four hundred false ones, and the blood ran out of his wound into the midst of his chariot; and one washed the chariot, and the dogs licked up his blood, and they washed his armor, according unto the word of the Lord, which he spake.

Now, who knows whether the prophecy antedated the event or the event the prophecy? The Lord could not have killed Ahab could he not have got him up to battle at Ramoth-gilead, and he had no means of getting him up there till one spirit told the Lord he would be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. Read the account for yourselves, and then realize to what miserable shifts Jehovah is obliged to resort to carry out his infinite purposes.

We now have Jezebel to dispose of, that the prophecy might be fulfilled in her case. The man of God, Elijah, is carried in a chariot of fire with horses of fire by a whirlwind into heaven (2 Kings ii, 11), after he had, in chapter i, twice censured a captain and his fifty men because King Ahaziah had sent to another prophet—the god of Ekron—to inquire whether he, the king, should recover from his sickness, instead of consulting his worship, Pope Elijah.

Now Ahab and Jezebel were very wicked, and were destroyed for murdering the innocent Naboth; but this man of God, after having slain four hundred prophets for no crime except prophesying in the name of Baal instead of Jehovah, called the fire of God down from heaven and consumed one hundred messengers, from the king to himself, innocent men, guilty of no evil, but who were compelled to do the king's bidding; and he would have consumed another fifty but that the captain came and fell on his knees before his august holiness and thus pleaded, "O man of God, I pray thee, let my life and the life of these, thy fifty servants, be precious in thy sight," etc.

Verily, who shall say Christians have not had examples in holy writ for their bloodiest persecutions and their most inhuman martyrdoms?

Elisha succeeds Elijah. That accursed mantle falls on an equally murderous successor, equally deceitful and treacherous. In chapter ix Elisha sends a young prophet to anoint Jehu; he is made king by the soldiers, thus usurping the throne; kills King Joram in the field of Naboth; by treachery slays King Ahaziah, and when Jezebel looks out of the window in the tumult, orders the eunuchs to throw her down, and her blood was sprinkled on the wall and on the horses, and Jehu trod her under foot; then this holy King Jehu came in, ate, drank, and ordered the "cursed woman" to be buried, but there was found nothing but her skull, her feet, and the palms of her hands; the dogs had eaten the rest while this immaculate king was drinking in his pride and feasting in his success.

So the word of the Lord was fulfilled fifteen years afterwards which he spake by his servant Elijah, The carcass of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field in the portion of Jezebel, so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel.

That the prophecy might be fulfilled in regard to the house of Ahab, this pious Jehu caused seventy of the sons of Ahab to be beheaded, and ordered their heads to be taken out of the baskets and laid in two heaps at the entering in of the gate. He also slew forty-two of King Ahaziah's brethren, and by a masterpiece of subtilty (see chapter x) destroyed all the worshipers of Baal out of Israel under a pretense of zeal for the Lord God; but he himself worshiped the golden calves in Bethel and Dan, and departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin.

Zeal for the Lord to-day, or a pretense of morality, leads the bigot and the knave to make war upon virtuous men and women for selling a little book, and to put them in prison in order to rid the community of their influence, lest their opposition to the existing God of Israel should open the eyes of some religious dupe; and were it possible, the Elijahs, Elishas, Jehus, and their confederates (alias the Comstock clique) would exterminate all those who will not bow their knee to their God, as did Jehu in his usurpation of the throne and in putting to death all the royal pairs, avowedly to destroy Baal and exalt the Lord God of Israel, when his own ambition, safety, and royalty were the ends he sought. Take heed; be on your guard; and be not deceived by the prophets of to-day.

Science or Theology?

Which has done most to elevate mankind, science or theology? Science. The word "science," from the Latin scientia, from scio to know, corresponds to the German wissenschaft, and, in its strictly literal sense, means simply knowledge. The word "theology," from the Greek theos, God, and logos, discourse, corresponds to the German theologie gotteslehre, and literally means a discourse, or teaching about God.

Now, our readers will please conceive of two substances, say copper and brass; and when I ask the question, Which has been most useful to man? they will answer copper or brass, as the case may be; if they answer copper, of course they mean copper only, and not a mixture of copper and brass. They may view copper as used in connection with brass or other materials, but they will nevertheless consider the use of copper only. So it is with this question, Science or Theology?

It must be admitted that knowledge is the only thing that ever raised man above the level of beasts. Without it even theology could not hav existed.

The only thing worthy the admiration of men is science. Extract it from theology, and it will leave nothing but speculative insanity and positive ignorance. Science has done all the good there has been done. Theology has done all the harm there has been done. Science has taught man to be true to himself. Theology has taught him to be true to his soul. Science has taught man to be honest. Theology has taught him to lie for Christ's sake. Science has demonstrated the laws of nature. Theology has taught the existence of ghosts and witches. Science has clothed the naked and fed the hungry. Theology has offered sacrifices to an imaginary being. Science has invented implements for the use of man; theology, for torture. Science has built steamships and railroads; theology, dungeons for the poor. Science has limited itself to a real world; theology, to an imaginary one. Science has filled the present with love; theology, the future with fear. Science cares for man's real body; theology, for his impossible soul. Science has sunk wells in the desert, built roads across its dreary waste, and made it bloom like a rose. It has brought treasures from the flinty bosom of the earth; it has cleansed our cities, reformed our prisons, stayed the ravages of disease, and robbed death of its terrors. Theology burnt Michael Servetus, brought Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots, to the block, and spilled the innocent blood of thousands of others. It has opposed every science. It has chained the human mind. It has blackened every drop of human blood circulating through the religious world with the doctrine of eternal punishment. It has made men stupid, and is keeping them so. It has deluged the world with blood, and threatened to destroy every vestige of knowledge. Let theology alone. Hold on to science. W. M. Schuwerk.

Taxation of Church Property.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: While the defense Liberals hav made against the assaults of crafty and adroit bigotry and arrogance, masked under the pretense of protecting the public purity, is commendable, its policy is subject to criticism if it engrosses their resources to such an extent, that no vitality and energy are left to make aggressive warfare and retaliation. The enemy has chosen a field of action so advantageous that they can actually deceive with ease part of the natural and even instinctive friends of tolerance and equitable rights, and cause others to conscientiously and honestly differ upon plausible technicalities and apparent pretexts of moral rectitude, and then grossly and unscrupulously misrepresent the comparatively isolated and scattering remnants. Defense and retaliation, in such an emergency, are unavoidable as well as imperative. Nevertheless it is not policy to do all of our fighting on fields selected by designing opponents, solely because their strategic surroundings are wholly in their favor. It is policy to shun their artifices as much as possible without incurring exposures more dangerous than the inevitabilities of a disadvantageous defense. Therefore I would recommend concentrating our forces for an aggressive attack on one of our strongest cases, say the taxation of church property. The justice of the demands of Liberalism are so manifestly axiomatical that ecclesiastical shrewdness long ago detected it and concluded to evade them entirely if possible by raising an issue over obscenity and keeping the campaign in that field.

We should confront them in a way that will consume their strength in defensive efforts, instead of leaving it all available for further onslaught, by compelling them to tell why the congregations of churches should enjoy privileges at the expense of other corporations and individuals, and what is the difference in the final results of exemption and granting appropriations, and if appropriations, direct or indirect, can be consistently maintained without making either the church or state dependent upon the other. Why should a voluntary church association of mere citizens possess greater rights than any other merely voluntary association of mere citizens? Is it consistent to claim a church to be a free public institution when an association or congregation retains sufficient control over it to actually rent out pews as strictly private property and prevent its general use by the general public on equal terms with the membership part of the congregation? Does not the Civil Rights bill make hotels and various other institutions just as much so? Why should not the association that owns a church manage it, prevent its general use by the general public, control it, receive its benefits, and honestly pay their honest share of taxes? What becomes of the freedom of conscience if believers may tax unbelievers, or unbelievers tax believers, to pay for their private congregational or denominational benefits? Is not that the result? Is not the practical effect of exemption the same as indirect appropriation? If churches are exempted, should not all property be exempted? Does not the church inconsistently degrade itself far beneath the dignity of ordinary worldly honor, which cannot ask more for self than self is willing to concede to others, by asking for discriminations instead of equal rights? Can church property avoid taxation on the grounds that it is a benefit to the community so far as it does not resort to public plundering? Is not the plea just as good and strong for factories, mills, stores, good hotels, comfortable dwelling-houses, and well-cultivated farms? If beneficial institutions that result in good to society were not taxed, could the government be sustained? If unjust to tax the costly churches and cathedrals because they are devoted to God, why tax the humble Christian homes of devotion, prayer, worship, sacred in the performance of religious obligations? Will not citizens consistently avoid paying their honest taxes so long as they idolize an institution that leads the way in the evasion of taxes and then degrades itself to moralizing the hypocrisy? Is it just and fair to exempt the sumptuous churches and cathedrals, often valued higher than the entire taxable property of a country township or sparsely populated county, thereby throwing an additional burden upon the rural districts without receiving any benefit because of their remoteness? Should not the state dictate to the churches the same as it controls the schools if it directly or indirectly grants them material aid in addition to its legitimate prerequisite of equally protecting their equitable rights? Is not the ancient plan of establishing and supporting one popular church by compulsory law just as tolerant and liberal as the modern plan of partially supporting a hundred, more or less, different ones in the same way? Should not private dwelling-houses be exempted, because they return no money revenue, as much as the churches, that do not raise revenues by pew rents or otherwise? What are churches, dwellings, and similar institutions built for unless there is to be some form of benefit or some means of realizing on the investment? Should they not be taxed merely to prevent extravagance and waste if there is no realization? Should the churches be indirectly pensioned or treated as paupers so long as they own over six hundred million dollars' worth of property in this country? Would it not be more truly philanthropic to relieve the burdens of destitute and suffering humanity by tax exemptions than to aggravate the helpless by intensifying their trials to make amends for favoritisms confiscated by wealthy societies?

These common questions, and numerous others equally as familiar, should be given to the most active opponents and the clergy, requesting them to giv a written answer to each in their numeric order, with the privilege of publication, explanatory of their opposition and defining their views of the matter from an equitable, moral, civil, and religious standpoint. I hav found the most reckless, blustering bigots are very cautious and shy about committing themselves upon those points in that manner. Priests well know that silence is safer than arguments that critics want to handle, hence they arrange all their battles so they can protect themselves in the guise of virtue, frowning at obscenity, etc.

If those who favor the taxation of church property do not comprise an absolute majority, they approximate very closely to it; and every means should be husbanded to make the matter known. When politicians become convinced that any measure is wanted by a large number of citizens, they naturally drift into its advocacy. Politicians do not create the currents of popular opinion so much as they endeavor to float with it. Hence all agitations of the subject that will call attention to it will result in our favor, and should be encouraged by every effective means available.

Perhaps the plan of petitioning the Legislature is the best yet devised, for it will naturally bring the matter up for discussion at every point in the state where the principle is applied, and draw the local papers into the controversy, thus making practical progress at the remote sources of legislative authority that will in the end avail more than the immediate effect at the representative centers. But its greatest advantage is the comparative ease with which it can be accomplished even by individuals isolated from local organizations. A single person in a township of ordinary size may secure two or three signatures by spending a single day, and that one town-meeting day, when little else would be done, by taking a position near the polls and inviting each voter's attention. The petition should be in the briefest form possible, to get the consideration of those in a hurry. Those distributed last year by H. L. Green are the best I hav seen. Two or three headings besides the one attached to the signature paper should be provided, that the decision of those slower than civil service reform may be obtained. Be sure and hav several written or printed questions similar to those hereinbefore given to worry the wits of those disposed to make opposition orally or otherwise. In the evening send a letter or postal card to each county paper stating the number of signatures obtained and what for; also note the nature of the opposition to your question-paper, should it by any event take a tangible shape, and get it and the replies thereto printed in as many local papers as possible, otherwise get it printed because none ventured a written answer. Hav the signatures written in a continuous line on only one side of the paper, for its length is an important consideration, and get more of them, if possible, than we got last year. The number should be increased each year until the request is granted, and can be if those interested in the matter will make any effort toward its accomplishment.

Thoughts for the Thoughtful.

INSCRIBED TO J. H. DODD.

Can anything be found in an effect that is not in the cause? No. Geology and kindred sciences teach that once there was no organism, vegetable or animal; hence no will nor conscience. Now there are both will and conscience. Whence came they? (It will be interesting to me to know how matter and its potencies can create will and conscience, yes, and consciousness.) You ridicule the statement that the sun and moon stood still, rivers dividing, shadows returning on the dial plate, etc. Well, you cannot ridicule them, for they are either facts or lies. If lies, please show it. If facts, your notions are emptier than chaff. It is a good game to ridicule what we cannot overthrow by fact or reason.—J. H. Dodd.

Friend Dodd: I do not think thy position a square one. If effect and cause are all one, why hav different names and definitions for them. The oak of to-day found its germ in the oak of years ago, and is partly the effect of that cause. But remember that no one effect results from a single cause, but everything that happens in this century is the result of all the causes of the past centuries. Single causes and effects cannot be separated from the influences of other causes and effects. Now the unborn child has no "will, consciousness, or conscience." But with the first breath of vital air, the first experience of separate life and identity, it begins to receive impressions upon the blank, void, empty substance of the brain, and these impressions are multiplied with every influence that bears upon the child. Cold, light, heat, food, pain, everything that effects it in any way, creates will and thought, and in time conscience, which latter quality is only the effect of education acting upon the organization of the individual, and this education is made up of all that is seen, heard, or felt. Just as organization grows and develops out of unorganization, the materials exist, always hav; but the combinations depend upon circumstances.

Children are often born idiotic. Does a God purposely create them thus? No; the conditions were not proper for a correct mental development, and the "will" and "conscience" never came. Children are born so full of scrofula and other diseases that life is a continual burden and torture to them. Who is responsible? Not a god who would surely create only good and perfect beings, but ignorance and selfish lust are the causes. Nature's laws always tend to produce good and well-balanced organizations, but if interfered with they are bent out of the proper course, just as a ball is when struck by a bat and sent directly out of the course it was projected in by the sender. This is not an "exception to the universal law," as thee thinks, but it is the result of several causes combining together and producing effects different from those that would hav resulted from the action of one or more primary causes.

It is not only me that ridicules the idea of the sun and moon standing still, but hundreds of regular doctors of divinity do not credit it, and I saw only a bit ago a statement that the sun and moon meant two armies that were commanded to take no part in the fight, but to simply stand and wait. All science proves it false if taken literally, but as the Book never means what it says when it relates what you believers don't wish to be true, it is probable these two stationary orbs were not the real sun and moon after all.

Yes, it is true enough that "law is interfered with every day." The law of water is to seek an equilibrium. Men dam it up; it patiently goes right on climbing till the top of the dam is reached, and then it once more rolls on its way. The dam "interfered" for a time, but it did not alter or change the law, and every law that held the flood back was just as truly acted out as that which caused it once more to flow onwards.

Materialism, Darwinism, and Atheism never hav "interfered" with a single natural law; only a god could do this, and as a god is as much an impossibility as a broken or interrupted law, I here defy them to prove the existence of either the one or the other. We call a law broken when we do not liv or do right, but really it is only changed from a direct result by interfering causes into other and different results, and all these are caused by direct and unchanging laws. A child is falling; the mother catches it and breaks its fall. One law, that of attraction, would hav brought the child to the floor; the will of the mother and her interposition interfered and other laws came into force and prevented its direct result; but all this was just as natural as the other would hav been. Will-power is just as much a natural force as is any other power. We will according to organization, development, education, and circumstances. The drunkard wills to drink, the gambler to play, the philosopher to study, but each is what he is through natural laws. It is your god-creators and god-believers who need to trouble with the impossible. To us naturalists there is only one way open. That is to learn the law of development, and liv as nearly in accordance with the needs of humanity in its highest and purest condition as is possible, and leave it to time to unveil the unknown and the hidden.

"Is there an Infinite, an Absolute?
And if there is, Infinite cannot put
One drop of its eternal sea of light
Into the tiny goblet of my sight?
Why trouble with a thing I cannot know?
Gauge action by the laws the senses show;
Study the interests of the time that is,
The space we look at. What beyond them lies
May be, or may not be like what we view;
A blank, unknowable, if false or true.
One cannot choose in reference to it then.
The bounded must all motive power contain."

A Few Thoughts Penned Down by Way of Comparison.

We will suppose the church to be a large corn-field, the bishops, deacons, and members the owners and guardians thereof, the people are the crows, the Bible the scarecrow, the priests use the power or wind to keep the scarecrow in motion so as to frighten the poor timid crow. Now, the crows, after being deceived and robbed of their just allowance year after year by the miserable fraud of a scarecrow until they are nearly starved to death, hav become desperate and determined to investigate the scarecrow business. Accordingly, they venture to approach it, and, upon examination, they find it to be a fraud, and nothing but a man of straw armed with a crooked stick for a gun, which the priests kept constantly turning as though it wanted to shoot all the crows in Christendom. Now, when they find they hav been deluded and wronged out of their just dues by the fraudulent image, they determine to hav satisfaction, and accordingly they make a raid on the corn-field; but no sooner do the bishops, deacons, etc., discover that the crows hav no fear or respect for their fraudulent image than they determine to compel them by force, and so the miserable horde arm themselves with the rack, thumbscrew, and other instruments of torture and death, and put to death all of the rebellious crows for having invaded the sanctity of the corn-field.

This is just what the Christian churches hav done for ages past and are still doing, wherever they hav the power, to this day.

The Two Moralities.—2.

In The Truth Seeker of February 28th I placed before readers the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," and singled out the Eighth for a little discussion. It reads as follows:

"We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall conform to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty."

This demand plainly concedes that there are two moralities—one Christian, the other natural; and it decidedly repudiates the one and accepts the other.

The subject of morals takes in the whole wide field of human conduct—takes in family and neighborly relations; political and social relations; state, national, and race relations; property and sex relations. This demand means them all, includes them all, and rightfully claims the abrogation of all Christian laws and conformity to natural laws concerning them all. A large part of general morals, however, pertains to the sex relation. There is difference between Christians and Naturalists with reference to all branches of morals, but not so much difference in any other branch as in the one concerning the relations of sex. There is more general agreement, the world over, between religionist and irreligionist concerning, for instance, the rights of property and concerning some of the rights of speech and opinion. There is a very general deprecation on all sides of lying and stealing. But when opinion, or the free expression of it, touches upon the relations of sex, Christian morality rouses itself at once and sets up claims that cannot be sanctioned by natural morality. It is the sex branch of morality with which, in this article, I propose to deal. It is sex morality to which the Comstock laws relate. It is sex morality, or rather the Christian interpretation of it, which has put Mr. Bennett in prison. It is sex morality which split the League at Syracuse. It is sex morality of which the Index and the Christian press generally take one side and The Truth Seeker, Investigator, and all other Liberal papers generally, the other. It is plain, then, that there are two views of sex morals extant throughout the enlightened world. These two views are formulated in the Eighth Demand, and these two views I am endeavoring to discuss.

Christian sex morality, then, means, and can only mean, concession to the claims of its priesthood to hav the sole and exclusive right to interfere, to impose its advice, to prescribe its rules, and in all ways to regulate the relations of sex. Christian morality claims that the church shall set the fashion, form the code of etiquette, and lay down all the laws concerning the relations of sex. The church has a moral liturgy, a ceremonial abracadabra, an inane kind of "intry mintry cutry corn," which she says over, and exacts a fee for saying, whenever a pair of her adherents enter upon sex relations; and she endeavors to extend, and does succeed in extending, her jurisdiction and impose this incantation upon all men and women, even those outside the Christian fold; and the Christian Church denounces all men and women as immoral who decline to take this turnpike to matrimony and pay toll at her gate. Indeed, large numbers of Liberals reject the Christian religion and yet accept its morals. They thoughtlessly concede this claim of the church to hav a right to impose a tariff and collect duties on all sex commerce—a tariff not alone of money but of conformity, of deference, of periodical report to celibates as to how connubiates are getting along. This is specially and openly the divine and infallible method in the Old Line Church, but it is scarcely less practiced in the Protestant opposition shop over the way. There are many subtle and unseen ways of extorting confession without going before a professional interviewer in the inquisitorial office. How do Liberals like this condition of subserviency in the dearest relations of life. Here they are bottled up in an atmosphere which they are compelled to breathe whether they like the fragrance of it or not—compelled, I mean, unless they dodge, or hide, or pay large penalty for open revolt.

Now, the remedy for this state of things is the general assertion by Liberals of the principles of natural morality.

It is time now to inquire what is natural morality. I do not know what Mr. Abbot meant by it when he formulated this Demand. I do not know as he meant anything. I am quite sure he did not know the far-reaching meaning of the Demand as it is formulated. I am sure, too, that his late writings all demand the enforcement of a more strict, more stringent, more unreasonable Christian morality. But leaving the platform-maker and his inconsistency aside, what must the phrase, "Natural morality" in the nature of things mean? Well, throughout all animated nature it means spontaneous development, growth, and progress of the individual, of whatever creation it may be, according to the laws of its being. The natural morality of a flower is that it shall blossom, be fragrant and beautiful, and offer hospitality to bees and humming birds, and beget other flowers after its kind. The natural morality of a bird is that it shall contribute its song to the universal concert, flash its colors as it flits over the landscape, catch the early worm, with other birds in its little nest agree, and leave a generation after its kind. The very "beasts," so much maligned, hav a morality many degrees higher than even the most enlightened nations of mankind, though perhaps a few hundred individuals may hav attained to that moral elevation—higher because it is natural morality and not Christian; higher because in the whole animal creation no male beast imposes his attentions upon the female. Every male beast has the politeness to first gain her consent. It is reserved for man alone, with his Christian morality, to exact "due benevolence," as the Christian confessional has it, and compel favors which he cannot win by natural selection.

With reference to man natural morality means conformity to nature in all his relations. In the relations of sex it means adaptation to the nature of the relation. It means observance of physical conditions, obedience to physiological laws, conformity to natural affections. That cannot be morally right which is physiologically wrong.

The scheme of social relations in which human beings find themselves placed is in the nature of a machine. There are several parts; there are nice adaptations, and they fit into each other precisely. There are springs and motors, rotations and revolutions, eccentrics and balances; and the whole results in a process and a product. The social machine has its conditions, and runs according to law, just like any material machine. If these conditions are fulfilled, if the law of its movement is obeyed, social order and individual happiness result; otherwise decidedly not. This machine is made on purpose and for a purpose. If that purpose is kept in view in the conduct of life, all goes happy and well. Natural morality then discards all extraneous considerations, insists on the logic of relations, and demands loyalty to its purpose. Natural morality because it is natural is not therefore lawless; but, unlike Christian morality, its laws conform to its nature, spring out of its nature, are decreed by its nature. Natural morality has its rules of politeness, its code of etiquette, and its penalties for violation. The practical working of this code and of these rules is the art side of nature. Every human process must hav its art as well as its nature. So simple a thing as the baking of a potato must hav its recipe—its oven so hot, its exposure to heat so long. How much more should the complex processes of love be regulated by the laws of its domain? The right administration of these laws requires the highest art. It is woman alone who has the happy tact and faculty of applying these principles and administering these laws. "What woman wills God wills." The human race will be safe as long as the mothers of it hav the untrammeled control of its continuity. Also, in an enlightened age, as man more and more emerges from the thirst for power and love of conquest and ownership; and as Christian morals more and more break down, and the course of true love more and more bursts its dams, dissipates its congestions, and equalizes its circulation through the human race, man will hav no reason to complain of the new order of things. When he wins by attraction what he now compels by force, two emancipations will be effected, one of the master, another of the slave, and both will be immeasurably happier for the changed relation.

If the "man Friday," the one lone human being which Robinson Crusoe found on his Island, had been woman Friday, and, after a brief but all the more ecstatic courtship from the choice being Hobson's, they had put in practice the theory of natural selection and taken each other for better or for worse, at their own option, that would hav been a clear case of natural morality. If there had been two Crusoes and two Fridesses, there would hav been the added element of choice, and survival of the fittest; but the unions effected would hav accorded with natural morality all the same. If the whole ship's officers and crew had been saved from the wreck, escaped to the Island, and had found an equal number of women castaways from a previous wreck, and no missionary, nor Christian, nor clergyman among them to invoke divine intervention in their unions, the morality would be natural just the same. Numbers would not affect the principle.

Suppose now these shipwrecked maidens and mariners, not stopping to theorize about "what constitutes a state," should simply proceed to make the best of their circumstances, and look about them for the means of subsistence. Suppose they should fashion their first rude tools, erect dwellings, establish homes, aid each other in labor, develop invention, share the results of labor equally, and generally make life in their new world as nearly as possible worth living. Suppose this should go on for 200 years, the men and women uniting in the most natural way, bearing children also in the most natural way, rearing them in comfort, asking no one's consent but the parties concerned, woman supreme in all that matter, and natural selection accorded its full play. Suppose all this time

> "The sound of the church-going bell
> These valleys and rocks never heard,
> Nor sighed at the sound of a knell,
> Nor smiled when a Sabbath appeared."

Now, however, to change the scene. Suppose at the end of 200 years this Island, with all its happy homes, its "natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty," should be "discovered" by some Christian nation, and the Christian discoverers should be shocked at the state of natural morality prevailing there. Suppose further the inevitable "missionary" should follow, who should at once commence preaching Christ and not him so much crucified as the people to whom he was preached. How soon there would be a new fall of man!—yes, and fall of woman! How soon depravity would become total! and heaven, where there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage, would be banished from the Island. Christian morality, with domestic strife, social discord, the mistress, the courtezan, and the unhappy wife, would speedily become the order of the—night. And those whom these troubles did not carry down to early and despairing graves, Christian rum, tobacco, and opium would finish.

There are further considerations which must be presented in another article.

Errata.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I desire that you correct some mistakes in my last article. In the eighth line from the bottom of the first column the word "losses" should be loans; and in sixth and seventh lines "fifty" thousand should read five thousand. In last line, same column, "intrust" should read interest. If I made these mistakes in my manuscript, attribute it to very poor health at that time.

Remarks of the Hon. Elizur Wright before the Massachusetts Legislative Committee.

The Massachusetts legislative committee on constitutional amendments gave a hearing, at the State House in Boston recently, upon a proposed amendment to the state constitution, so as to giv equal freedom for all beliefs and disbeliefs before the law, as prayed for by the Paine Liberal League and others. Elizur Wright, J. C. Verity, and other gentlemen, advocated the amendment, which is expressed as follows in the petition;

No belief or disbelief on matters concerning any or all religions shall exercise or hold, in any way, shape, or manner, the slightest pre-eminence, immunity, exemption, or advantage, under the law, over any other belief or disbelief on matters concerning any or all religions; and no person or property shall be in any manner exempt from the public duties, taxes, or other burdens, on account of any religious or irreligious considerations.

The Hon. Elizur Wright addressed the committee at length, and appended will be found a comprehensive summary of his remarks:

A constitution of government, to be in the highest degree useful, must not contradict itself. If a constitution declares that all men are born free and equal, that they hav a right to enjoy and defend their lives and liberties, that the liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a state, then it necessarily follows that every man has a right to hold and express his own opinions, whatever they may be, provided he doth not disturb the public peace or obstruct others in the enjoyment of their liberties. It also necessarily follows that the majority stultifies itself if in the same constitution it dictates or declares what opinions on any subject the minority ought to hold. The fundamental declaration of the majority, above cited, on which the constitution of Massachusetts rests, is its solemn pledge not to meddle with opinions, but only with acts that disturb the public peace, or obstruct others in the enjoyment of the liberties that are guaranteed to all alike. Yet the constitution of Massachusetts, as originally adopted, did contradict itself by undertaking to compel the legislature to compel the several towns, parishes, and precincts to make provision for the public worship of God, with Protestant teachers of piety and religion, and to compel attendance thereon.

By the progress of Liberal opinions the majority at length came to see that this did not work well in practice. Contradictions seldom do. Article 3 of the Bill of Rights was then stricken out, and article 11 of the amendments was substituted for it. Massachusetts no longer compelled towns, parishes, precincts, and other bodies politic, or religious societies, to make suitable provision, etc., in case such provision was not made voluntarily; and no longer invested the "legislature with authority to enjoin upon all subjects an attendance upon the instructions of the public teachers aforesaid." But it still asserted the abstract opinion that the public worship of God promotes the happiness and prosperity of a people and the security of a republican government. And it asserted this opinion as a reason for lending the civil power to religious bodies to enforce their taxes for the support of public worship. And in the very same breath, as if conscious that such a loan of power was a contradiction of the first article of the Bill of Rights, it provided that any member of such a body should be exempt from any such tax by filing with its clerk a "written notice declaring the dissolution of membership." Notwithstanding this total nullification of the loan of power granted in the preceding clause, the legislature proceeded (see General Statutes, chapter 30) to enact the said loan, in detail, including the provision which made it of no practical effect. Were it only to escape the ridicule and contempt of all the logical minds in the civilized world, Massachusetts should amend this article 11 of the amendments so as to make it consistent with itself, to say nothing of making it consistent with the preamble and article 1 of the Bill of rights.

But the Legislature, in chapter eleven, section five of the General Statutes, has committed an injustice in direct conflict with the preamble and article one of the Bill of Rights, for which the only possible excuse is the principle or abstract opinion stated in article eleven of the amendments. It, by that law, exempts from taxation all "houses of religious worship," no matter how extravagantly built or furnished. This is no less a subsidy than if the amount of the tax remitted were paid to the religious or worshiping bodies annually out of the state treasury. Now, if these religious bodies accept that subsidy, then the abstract opinion which asserts that the worship of God is the security of republican government does not apply to them. If that opinion is true at all, it is only true of a worship which does not conflict with justice—a worship tendered by a body of men and women who insist, individually and collectively, on paying to the state a fair and just compensation for the protection which their worship and their ecclesiastical property recieve from the state. A religion which is willing to accept any direct or indirect subsidy from the state, and actually receives it, comes in conflict, more or less, with the pecuniary interests of the irreligious, and is therefore manifestly a source of insecurity to a republican government. Franklin, perhaps the wisest statesman of the last century, in 1780 wrote to Rev. Dr. Price, himself a statesman as well as a religious man:

When a religion is good, I conceive it will support itself, and when it does not support itself, and God does not care to support it, so that its professors are obliged to call for the help of the civil power, 'tis a sign, I apprehend, of its being a bad one.

If this be true, and all religions were to be placed in the constitution on a precise equality with irreligion, in regard to favorable opinion, taxation, and everything else, no religions would die except bad ones.

Macaulay, one of the wisest statesmen of the present century, and, by no means, an enemy to religion, wrote, as long ago as 1840, thus:

Every man, be he idolater, Mohammedan, Jew, Papist, Socinian, Deist, or Atheist, naturally loves life, shrinks from pain, desires those comforts which can be enjoyed only in communities where property is secure. To be murdered, to be tortured, to be robbed, to be sold into slavery, to be exposed to the outrages of gangs of foreign banditti calling themselves patriots—these are evidently evils from which men of every religion and men of no religion wish to be protected; and therefore it will hardly be disputed that men of every religion and of no religion hav thus far a common interest in being well governed. . . But, whether there be one God or many, what may be his natural and what his moral attributes; in what relation his creatures stand to him; whether he has ever disclosed himself to us by any other revelation than that which is written in all the parts of the glorious and well-ordered world which he has made; whether his revelation be contained in any permanent record; how that record should be interpreted, and whether it has pleased him to appoint any unerring interpreter on earth—these are questions respecting which there exists the widest diversity of opinion, and respecting which the great majority of our race has, ever since the dawn of regular history, been deplorably in error.

Now, here are two great objects; one is the protection of the persons and estates of citizens from injury; the other is the propagation of religious truth No two objects more entirely distinct can well be imagined. The former belongs wholly to the visible and tangible world in which we liv; the latter belongs to that higher world which is beyond the reach of our senses. The former belongs to this life; the latter to that which is to come. Men who are perfectly agreed as to the importance of the former object, and as to the way of attaining it, differ as widely as possible respecting the latter object. We must, therefore, pause before we admit that the persons, be they who they may, who are intrusted with power for the promotion of the former object ought always to use their power for the promotion of the latter object,

If there is any force in this argument of Macaulay, our constitution of civil government should express no opinion whatever in regard to the importance, or utility, or obligation of religious worship. It professes to be an agreement. The parties to it agree that all religious worship consistent with the public peace, that is, which does not interfere with the rights of other worshipers or non-worshipers, shall be protected from violence or disturbance. They do not agree as to its obligation, importance, or utility. To say that they do is to say what is not true to-day, even if it were true forty years ago, which may be doubted. There are good citizens of both sexes to-day who believe in the eternal laws of justice, order, and harmony of the universe, but do not believe that these laws any more depend on the personal will of a "legislator of the universe" than the rule of three does; and who think it as idle and unreasonable to pray to the infinite and unknowable as it would be to pray to the attraction of gravitation. It does not follow that these citizens feel any less than others the ties and obligations of human brotherhood, or that they will do less to make this world happy because they do not know or profess to know anything of another.

All these citizens ask is that practically they shall be placed on an equality with all others before the fundamental law, and that there shall be no expression of opinion in the constitution to which they cannot agree.

If there is a flaw in Macaulay's argument, if there is a knowable "legislator of the universe," who exercises a providence over human affairs, and whose direction we are under obligation by acts of supplication and worship to seek, as the present Constitution plainly declares, then the Constitution itself, and the "frame of government" it establishes, being simply an agreement between parties who never showed any commission or special sanction from the legislator of the universe, or pretended to, hav no right to exist. There should be no government except a theocracy. Indeed, unless the legislator of the universe has abdicated, there cannot be any other. It is for kings and popes to govern by "divine right," but not for republics.

A Good Word for Mr. Bennett.

A gentleman sending a subscription for the Health Monthly, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the information it (the Health Monthly) gives its readers in regard to preventing disease, etc.; much more happy am I to see that you are men who dare say a good word for that grand old man, D. M. Bennett, who is now in prison for breaking no law of God or man, and as I see month after month passing by, and President R. B. Hayes taking no measures to liberate the victim of superstitious fanaticism, it is a sure sign there is something rotten, not only in Denmark but in America."

By the way, we hav a cheery little line from Mr. Bennett. He regrets that any effort was made for his liberation based upon his recent illness. He says, "If I cannot be liberated on the merits of the case, why let me stay here until my time is served out, say I." It will be gratifying to Mr. Bennett's friends to learn that he is in more comfortable health, in such excellent spirits, and withal so brave.

John Brown Smith at Liberty.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been released from Northampton Jail, after eleven months of imprisonment. About a dozen or more different persons offered to pay the tax and costs of commitment amounting to $5 62, at different times the past eight months, but the officials claimed the board money, and consequently continuously declined to release me. Finally, they instructed the sheriff, on February 25th, to release me as above, and that they would agree not to make a claim of board-money against him. The board and other expenses amounted to over $100. Somebody paid the $5.62, and I was released at once. Of course, the town feels as though they had been badly beaten because they had lost so much and still failed to force me to pay it or to convince me that their way of thinking was better than my own. It would hav taken another year of imprisonment to bring the town to unconditional terms of surrender, and my friends thought nothing would be gained by it. Of course I come out with the principle of voluntaryism in society, vindicated because I did not pay the tax, and it was paid, voluntarily, by another person who thought it a duty to release me from prison. I hope that D. M. Bennett will come out of prison in good condition. My address will be Amherst, Mass.

Yours fraternally, John Brown Smith.

Liberal League Notes.

Mr. S. Hoag, of New York Mills, Oneida county, N. Y., is attempting to organize an auxiliary League in that town. Every Liberal in the vicinity should aid him.

Friends in the state of New York who desire headings for petitions for the taxation of church property can apply to E. M. Sellon, No. 12 S. Division street, Buffalo, or to me. There is no time to be lost in circulating them.

I learn from the Cleveland Herald that Prof. B. F. Underwood spoke to an immense audience at Case Hall, in Cleveland, on the evening of February 25th. The Herald states that "Mr. Underwood is to-day classed as one of the best representative speakers in the lecture field of extreme Liberal belief, and is second only to Robert G. Ingersoll."

Each member of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, each member of the state sub-committees, the secretaries of the various Local Leagues, the Liberal speakers who are interested in the Liberal League movement, and any other friends of the League movement, are requested to forward me any items of news in relation to the League movement that may come to their knowledge. Write briefly but to the point.

Mr. R. P. Wilcox, a worthy young man of sixteen years of age, is publishing The Monthly Review, a small but interesting Liberal paper, at Milan, Erie county, Ohio. As it is but twenty cents a year, every Liberal should subscribe for it, and aid our young friend. In a few years we shall need such young men to take the place of those who are now at the head of our Liberal journals. I am confident our young friend will make his mark in the future.

On February 22d an auxiliary Liberal League was formed in the city of Dallas, Texas, consisting of some forty members. Mr. John Stone was elected President, and Dr. D. Mackey, Secretary. I also learn that in Houston, Texas, the public mind has been greatly agitated by a biblical controversy between Major Penn, a Baptist revivalist, and Col. Eldridge, a Liberal lecturer. Penn spoke in Armory Hall, and Col. Eldridge in Gray's Opera House, which was thronged. The Jewish Rabbi Voorsanger has taken a hand in the controversy, and the whole city has become interested in it.

Mr. Willis McDonald, of Walla Walla, Washington territory, is very desirous that some Liberal lecturer from the East visit that section in the interest of the Liberal League movement. He says: "There are a great many Liberalists and Spiritualists on the Pacific coast, and with a little effort a great many Leagues could be formed, which would strengthen the cause materially. Some of the Liberal friends here hav requested me to send to you for blanks and instructions to form a Liberal League. Please send the documents along, and we will proceed to organize and take out a charter. I think we can start with twenty members." Speakers who are going West should correspond with Bro. McDonald. His address is P. O. Box 234, Walla Walla, Washington territory.

Friends who desire to organize auxiliary Liberal Leagues can proceed in the following manner. Draw up a paper as follows: "We, the undersigned, residents of the town of ——, in the state of ——, do hereby agree to be the charter members of a Liberal League auxiliary to the National Liberal League, and pay the sum set opposite our respective names, for the purpose of procuring a charter for a League to be known as "The —— Liberal League of ——." That so soon as the charter is obtained we agree to meet at the time and place designated by a majority of the following-named persons and perfect the organization of the League. We authorize the first person hereafter named to order our charter and act as our secretary until our permanent secretary is elected.

So soon as ten or more names are procured and five dollars paid in, the temporary secretary will send a post-office order, or registered letter, for five dollars, and the names of the proposed charter members, to Prof. A. L. Rawson, Secretary National Liberal League, 34 Bond street, New York city, on receipt of which Secretary Rawson will return the charter with the charter members' names inscribed thereon. Then the charter members should meet and permanently organize. They can adopt such constitution and by-laws as they choose not in conflict with the Constitution of the National Liberal League.

After a Liberal League is organized, if it intends to liv and prosper, it should engage in some practical work. The following letter from Prof. H. M. Kottenger will giv our League friends a good idea of what a live League can and should do. The Professor says:

The Liberal League of San Jose, Cal., was organized on the 17th of September, 1879. Ever since we hav held regular meetings every Sunday in a hall, and besides we hav had several social gatherings at private residences. The following are the subjects we hav discussed at our Sunday meetings: "Total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools;" "Women ought to hav equal rights with men;" "Has the government the right to impose licenses on the sale of goods?" "Is the actual management of our state prisons human?" "The evolution theory applied to the dogma of immortality;" "The platform of the National Liberal League;" "Did Jesus Christ ever exist? and if so, what do we know concerning his life?" "Has the Christian religion proved a benefit to mankind?" With the League a Liberal lyceum is connected, in which several teachers instruct the youth every Sunday. My book, "The Youth's Liberal Guide," among others, is used as a text-book for the lyceum. On the 29th of January we paid a modest tribute to the memory of Thomas Paine, by a public meeting, at which addresses, speeches, and singing, appropriate for the occasion, were engaged in.

Friends, the Liberal cause was never before so prosperous as it is to-day. Let us everywhere cease our domestic contentions, close up our lines, and turn our guns on the common enemy of liberty and mental freedom. On the one hand, let us cordially fellowship that class of Liberals represented by the scholarly and popular lecturer B. F. Underwood, and, on the other hand, the class represented by that most pointed, sarcastic, and interesting writer T. C. Leland. We hav a great conflict before us, and before the victory is gained we shall stand in need of all the aid we can receive from any quarter. H. L. Green.

Salamanca, N. Y., Feb. 29, 1880.

A Positivist's View of Thomas Paine.

The following letter, by T. B. Wakeman, was read at the Paine Celebration, held in Paine Hall, Boston, January 29th. It should hav appeared before, though it belongs to the kind of documents that never get outdated:

New York, Jan. 27, 1880.

Dear Friends: It is certain I cannot be with you on your St. Thomas's Day—the 29th—in body, but in that which is more important—in spirit, heart, mind, and purpose, count me as present. Your kind invitation recalls some of the grand qualities of your Hero, which are now sadly needed, and which I hope your festival will help to revive and "materialize" in us all:

1. His sublime faith and courage. In the dread crisis that tried the souls of men, he saw that "Forward to Independence!" was the only way out. So with us—Forward to an independent substantial Liberal organization is the only way out of the bulragging with which our enemies hope to wear us out. It is not our business to answer scandals, but to secure and organize liberty and progress. All we hav to do with the bad, even if it exists, is to drop it and go right on with the good. The only answer to a bad past is a better future. Mind! I don't take it for granted that the past has been very bad. I think it has been as good as could reasonably hav been expected under the circumstances. Many dogs run out and bark terribly when you pass their old houses, not because you are doing wrong, but because you do pass them. You will never get anywhere if you stop to silence those curs with whips, words, or even stones. That is just what they want. It makes mighty big dogs of them. Only drive on briskly about your real business, and not one of the little, metaphysical whiffets will follow you far.

2. The next great quality of your Hero that you must infuse into us is his Patriotism of Humanity. "The world is my country!" he said. What enlargement of heart and soul is there in those words! It is to liv at once in, and for, the whole, the good, and the true. It is to develop the fulness and glory of life in ourselves and our fellows to the uttermost; to make the whole world one country and our country; that is, to glorify man by realizing his brotherhood in act and thought. When that is all done, there will be time to glorify the gods.

3. The religion of your Hero and saint you must make ours as fast as possible.

"To do good is my religion!" That was his life-object and motto. That is affirmative, constructive, positive! It is the Religion of Humanity in a line. We too generally regard Paine as an iconoclast—a negative, destructive agitator. But this was only half of his character and career. He was a builder, not only of iron bridges, but of Republics, including our own, and also of Faiths. He, as much as any man of his time, built up the common faith of the people in Science, that is, in the verifiably true, instead of scholastic nonsense. But, more than this, he built up the faith among the people in the essential goodness of the human heart, instead of its utter depravity. He had an abiding faith in the people, in his race, in Humanity, and in its ultimate progress, victory, and glory! And thereby, by this human religion, he has been saved in spite of all the gods and devils, and even his own faults, and has left the hope of some salvation even for the worst of us if we but liv and work for the interests that cannot die. So true is it that

"For all human failings
A pure Humanity atones."

Now, that you may not take my letter for a sermon, let me end it with a toast:

"Thomas Paine—the Hero-Author!—who, in order to do the Good, taught us to dare to know the True!"

Yours ever, T. B. Wakeman.

To Messrs. Mendum and Seaver.

The contrast.

Boston, Jan. 17, 1880.

Mr. E. Mendum, Sec'y: Your invitation, in behalf of the Committee, to be one of the speakers at the celebration of Paine's birth-day, at Paine Hall, has been received, and is respectfully declined. Truly yours, Francis E. Abbot.

Chrishna, 1200 B. C.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: From various sources of ancient and modern lore I hav deducted the following concise sketch of the life, doctrine, and works of Chrishna, the Hindoo savior of the world. One remarkable feature of his life is the striking analogies between him and Christ, who, it is recorded, had an existence 1,200 years afterward:

The name of Chrishna's virgin mother was Maia, who, it is written, conceived her son by the overshadowing spirit of God (Brahma). The Hindoo Holy Bible declares that Brahma and Siva, with hosts of attending spirits, came to Maia and sang to her, "In thy delivery, O favored among women! all nations shall hav cause to exult!" He was foretold by his forerunner, Bali Rama, who proclaimed him throughout all India previous to his advent.

On the 25th day of December, 1200 B. C., at the conclusion of the brazen age, at midnight, in a cave in the land of Matarea, amid the denizens of subterraneous abodes, in order to teach the people a lesson of true humility, God (Brahma) put on mortality by coming to earth in the person of the child savior, Chrishna, in exact fulfilment of prophecy. The child purported to hav been delivered through his mother's side. When the celestial infant appeared, a chorus of heavenly spirits saluted him with hymns, the whole room was illuminated by his light, and the understanding of his parents was opened, so that they knew him to be the preserver of the world, and they at once began to worship him. He was also visited by a chorus of angels, and surrounded by prophets and shepherds from the East, who were guided hither by a bright star, which indicated his birthplace, and which also indicated his divinity, for we are told as soon as Nared heard of his fame he examined the stars and pronounced him the son of God (Brahma). Gold, frankincense, and myrrh were presented to him as offerings, in appreciation of his majesty and glory.

When Chrishna was still an infant, his mother and "adopted" father, Nanda—a carpenter by trade—were warned by an angel to flee with their child from the wrath of the tyrant Cansa, the then ruler of that nation. The decree of this ruler for the destruction of the young savior was as follows: "Let active search be made for whatever young children there may be upon earth, and let every boy in whom there may be found signs of unusual greatness be slain without remorse."

By this fiendish and bloody scheme he hoped to destroy the god-child, for he had heard of his greatness being sounded abroad, and he feared for his own power and glory among the people. But Chrishna's parents, in response to the angel's warning, had fled with him to Gokul, a region remote from his natal place. In their flight Maia and Nanda approached the river Jumna, the waters of which were miraculously separated, so that they passed over dry-shod, in a similar manner to Moses at the Red Sea, as recorded in the Christian Bible of the present day.

When Chrishna was probably eleven or twelve years of age his parents sent him to a learned Brahmin as tutor, whom he greatly astonished with his vast learning, and under whose tuition he mastered the whole circle of sciences in a day and a night.

This savior was perfect and without sin, and his mission on earth was not to destroy previous religion but to purify it, and to preach better doctrines, declaring himself to be the savior of the world—the way, the mediator between God and man. He passed life in doing good—preaching (one remarkable sermon reported to hav been delivered on a mount), teaching in parables, calling sinners from the evil of their ways, performing wonderful miracles, and raising the dead. One of his first miracles was the cure of a leper. With all his greatness he was so humble as to wash his friends' feet. He chose twelve disciples from among his believers, who followed and worshiped him as "God the Most High;" also, styling him Redeemer, Mediator, Messiah, Intercessor, the Holy Lamb, the True Light, the Giver of Light, etc. His disciple, Amarca, upon a certain occasion, addressed him thus: "Thou art the Lord of all things, the God of the Universe, the Emblem of Mercy, the Bestower of Salvation!" He was also proclaimed as "Judge of the Dead;" also termed "the Lion of the Tribe of Sakia."

The Christian missionary, Huc, says: "A Mogul, or Thibetan, when asked who Chrishna was, will reply: 'The savior of men.'

In the time of Alexander the Great—330 B. C—readers of history will remember that millions of people worshiped him as God. He was also represented as the seed of the woman, crushing the serpent's head. On ancient sculptures and monuments he is represented with his heel on the head of a serpent, thus proving that his mission was to save the people from sin, or the devil. So great and wonderful appeared his works to the men of that day that they who saw them declared to his father, Nanda, that he could not possibly be his father, and so widespread was his fame and popularity that over 300,000,000 people were brought to worship him as a God and believer in his divinity.

Chrishna taught the ordinance of baptism, setting the example himself by being immersed in the river Ganges.

We are told by writers that he spread among the people holy doctrines of purest morality, teaching them exalted principles of charity, self-denial, and self-respect, at a time when the desert countries of the West were inhabited only by savage tribes, and at a time long before Christ and his career were thought of. Cunningham says the Hindoos were indebted to Chrishna for a code of pure and practical morality which inculcated charity, chastity, the performance of good works, abstinence from evil, and general kindness to all living things. His precepts, which would fill a volume, display profound thought and wisdom, as the following selected ones will show:

Let your hand be always open to the unfortunate.
Avoid envy, covetousness, falsehood, imposture, and slander.
Only the humble are beloved of God.
Do good for its own sake.
Above all things cultivate love for your neighbor.
Look not upon women with unchaste desire.
Women should be protected with tenderness and shielded with fostering solicitude.
Degrade woman and you degrade man.
Do right not from fear of punishment.
From thought springs the will, from the will action, true or false, just or unjust.

It is recorded of Chrishna that so great was his tenderness and compassion that he forgave his enemies, and, after giving up the ghost, descended into hell to teach souls in bondage.

At thirty years of age he was betrayed to his enemies—who sought to destroy him through envy and a belief that he was an impostor—by one of his twelve disciples, Angada by name, after which he was crucified by being nailed to a cross between two thieves, for the sins of the people. His followers believed that by his blood, which was shed upon the cross, atonement was forever made for all their transgressions, and that all animal and human sacrifice was henceforth done away with. When this pagan savior knew his last hours had come, forbidding his disciples to follow him, he repaired to the banks of the river Ganges, and, having performed three ablutions, he knelt down, and, looking up to heaven, prayed to God (Brahma). During his crucifixion a cloud surrounded the moon, and the sun was darkened at noonday, and the sky rained ashes and fire down from heaven. Three days after his burial he arose from the dead and appeared to his disciples in all his divine majesty; after which he ascended to Brahma (God) in the presence of a multitude, and they who saw him exclaimed, "Lo! Chrishna's soul ascends to its native skies!—to the bright paradise from whence he had descended!"

In the British Museum are drawings from characters on ancient Hindoo sculptures and monuments, by Mr. Moore, an English traveler and writer, in which Chrishna is represented with nail-holes in his hands and feet, and in one with a halo of glory over him, emanating from heaven above, just as many hav seen Christ represented; and in another with a hole in his side, and to his collar hangs the emblem of a heart. He is believed by his followers to come again to earth, when a destruction of the world is expected to take place. Hindoo Holy Bibles prophesy of the event in the following beautiful and suggestive language: "He shall come crowned with light; the stars shall pale before his splendor; the earth will be too small to contain him, for he is infinite, he is almighty, he is wisdom, he is beauty, he is all in all; he will be as sweet as honey and as pure as a lamb without spots, or as the lips of a virgin. It will be a day of joy and exultation, when God shall manifest his power and his glory, and shall reconcile the world unto himself."

Chrishna is believed by historians and missionaries to hav been an actual personage—that the statements of his physical existence, at least, was not conceived in the brains of fabulous historians; also, colossal figures, temples, and caves, inscribed with characters, confirm his reality; and his race and cities and coins of his time still exist. Uncle Lute.

General Garfield.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In my last I promised to write a little upon the finance question, but I find that that question is well and ably presented in your paper by others. I will therefore present to your readers a remarkable position taken by that so prominent member of Congress and future senator of Ohio, General James A. Garfield, who on the 21st day of May, 1878, during the time of the discussion of the Army bill, said:

"If in anything I hav heretofore said or written upon this subject I hav unnecessarily or improperly run into partizanship, I shall certainly not do so to-night. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, said: 'Now we are told we ought to hav a large army, and a very large army, in order to put down impending strikes. I take issue with that proposition. It is not in accordance with the theory of this government that the United States is to maintain an army for the purpose of restraining any portion of its citizens in their just rights. The right to strike is a just right. No man can coerce another to do work against his will. It is just as sacred a right as the right to employ, if you can find somebody who is willing to hire himself out to you. The wisdom of striking is quite another matter.' Now I agree absolutely with that statement; but while I hold to all rights of laborers to manage their own affairs, each for himself, I say it at whatever hazard, the man who lays any obstacle in the way of any American which prevents him from working is a breaker of the law and a violator of the first right of a laborer."

Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts: "How is it with capitalists who combine with other capitalists against the employed?"

Garfield: "It is just as great a violation of the law."

Upon this subject the Hon. J. F. House, of Tennessee, said: "Mr. Speaker, when demonstrations of mob violence and disregard of the laws of the land are made by any considerable number of our people, it may be safely assumed that other causes are at work, that other reasons exist for such outbreak than can be found in any perverse spirit of Communism. It is a notable fact connected with the recent strikes in this country that the railroad corporations made the first combinations. They consulted together and determined to reduce wages. It is the sheerest folly for capital to form its combinations and then turn up its eyes in holy horror if labor also combines for its own protection. It is a great mistake to suppose that in the recent clash and conflict between capital and labor the right was all on one side and the wrong on the other."

Garfield: "When the Life of Thomas Jefferson was written, by S. S. Randall, of New York, a copy of the volume was sent to the great British historian Lord Macaulay. He answered, thanking the author for the volume, but remarked that he had no admiration for Jefferson. The American expressed his surprise, and desired to know his reasons. Thereupon Macaulay, on the 23d day of May, 1857, wrote a letter in which he said: 'I do not believe that it is possible to establish institutions that will be permanent based upon the votes of people counted by the head. That proceeds upon the supposition that the rich and the poor, the wise and the ignorant, the virtuous and the vicious, are all counted as equals, and endowed with equal political power. That,' said he, 'is the fatal vice of your institutions that Jefferson founded.' I endeavored five years ago to answer it, and said that Macaulay took no account of the tremendous power of our educational forces. He did not know, he could not know, the almost omnipotent power of universal education to enlighten and ennoble our people and fit them for the liberties and duties of American citizenship. In this rests our hope; and while the light of our schools shines undimmed and unclouded upon all our children we may safely count upon centuries of liberty and safety."

At the same time, at the same place, and in the same breath—the pending proposition being the reduction of the army to fifteen thousand men—he said: "The time may come when we shall find it necessary to fight for society; and when that time comes, the first signal of the contest will make [pointing to the Democratic side of the chamber] us one. To what power shall we look in that struggle to protect and save society if it be not to the Constitution and the strong arm of the national government? I trust that the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, whose material stake in the stability and good order of the Union is much greater than mine, will help to make that stake secure, and consent to an amendment fixing the army at twenty-five thousand men."

In reference to the bill demonetizing silver, in 1873, this great statesman, in a speech delivered in Springfield, Ohio, said: "It is but due to say, for it is the truth, that I know nothing about the bill. It was passed, like many other bills, upon the recommendation of the chairman of the committee which had it in charge. I, as chairman of the committee on appropriations, having my hands full of work, took the word of a prominent Democrat and Republican that it was all right. The ayes and nays were not asked for, and I do not remember whether I voted at all."

The poor fellow remembers distinctly that the ayes and nays were not asked for on such an important measure, but does not remember whether he voted at all. How convenient sometimes a failure to record the vote! And for passing that bill without remembering it this great man was rewarded by the capitialists with a seat in the Senate.

The Oneida Community.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I desire to say a few words in reply to L. E. Huggins, and to begin with, will say that I hav lived within one mile of the "family" mentioned above nearly fourteen years, and hav taken great pains to study into their system and mode of living; therefore I am supposed to be nearly as well posted as any one outside of their institution. They hav not been subjected to any personal violence since they were forcibly ejected from Putney, Vt., in 1848, and hav had a chance to "liv their religion" since that time. How well they hav lived it let them that know those best answer. There are among them some who are very fair and honorable in their dealings with their neighbors, and some who are tricky and dishonorable, just as there are in all classes of society.

Now let us look to the results which their social system has produced, in the order in which Mr. Huggins gives them. He says "they hav been invariably orderly and quiet citizens, even under the most aggravating circumstances."

In some respects the above is true, but they hav not had any of those aggravating circumstances since they hav been residents of Madison County excepting on one occasion. Then they were fined by the county court for whipping Miss Hubbard, a young member, nearly to death because she would not submit herself to the lustful desires of one of their number. The proof of the above can be found, if necessary, on the court records at Morrisville, N. Y., together with much other evidence that I would readily submit to the readers of this paper were it not contrary to the law to send such matter through the United States mail.

Mr. Huggins says, "They hav established large and flourishing business enterprises." Not very large. They consist of the manufacture of silk, and steel traps, and canning some fruit. But all these are done by hired labor, their own men only acting as superintendents in each department. He says "they are all industrious." They are considered by all those who are intimately acquainted with them to be, as a whole, very indolent. They don't need to "tramp," for they can liv without work at home.

Mr. Huggins says "they are all well informed." They may be in some things, but all the younger members, or very nearly all of them, are very ignorant of the manners and customs of the outside world only as they see them developed in the numerous visitors at their residence.

Concerning their "houses of correction," neither Mr. Huggins nor any other person outside of their own ranks can say for a certainty. They hav a time set apart on purpose to "tattle." It is an evening meeting, where each one is required to tell what he has seen amiss in any other member during the day.

Among their children there is at least one perfect idiot, and many others mentally deficient. No visitors are allowed to hold any conversation with their children, and only a few in their employ hav any chance to ascertain their mental caliber. Their children certainly hav all the modern conveniences and the best of care.

They are not tempted to "murder their own flesh and blood to hide their shame," simply because it will not hide it. Will murder hide the shame of a public harlot?

Mr. Huggins, ere you again let your mind soar so high in the ethereal sphere to describe this institution go ask the down-trodden women of your "happy family" to speak their mind, women that dare not say their souls are their own, women that dare not speak to a visitor for fear of their masters. Pale, weary-eyed, downcast women, that their masters force to submit to their every whim! Go ask them are they happy! I am a believer in woman's rights.

Go ask their children, controlled and drilled as they are. They will tell you the truth, if out of sight and hearing of their masters.

Go ask their young girls. They will tell you, as they did a party of visitors last summer. A few hav escaped, but they are vigilant, and rarely leave an opportunity.

Ere you giv your pen to their defense and praise once more, I should advise you to visit them and use your sense of sight, and inquire of any of their neighbors. You can obtain all the information you desire, with malice toward none. Freelover though you may be, you will find no free love there, but in its stead free lust. It is said that they hav given up their social system since I left the neighborhood. I earnestly hope it is true. FRED. S. HAMMOND.

That Little Lecture.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am very sorry that my little lecture should hav so wounded the feelings of our friend Chapman, or any one. It was not my desire to either ridicule or throw clubs at the Spiritualists. I believe that most of the Spiritualists are good, honest, intelligent people. And as they are denouncers of the orthodox hell, I can take them kindly by the hand as friends of humanity. But why should not friend Chapman be willing to giv me the same right which he claims for himself?—the right to express my opinions.

I am charged with having "made some very grave errors." Well, that's not to be wondered at; for, as I said at the outset, I didn't know anything about gods, ghosts, devils, souls, spirits, or the things in another world. And I am not sure but I had best attend more to the things in this world and never mind about the things in the next world.

I made precisely the same statement about canning a soul at the Lansing camp-meeting that I made in THE TRUTH SEEKER. And when it was proposed to hav Rev. Mr. Andrus criticise my speech, the president objected, saying that he was a Spiritualist, and also a Liberalist, and he considered that I had just as good a right to my opinions as he had to his, and that he was too good a lawyer to allow any quarreling.

But I understand that at another time when I was not present, Mr. Andrus, in replying to my speech, showed a good deal of intolerance and bigotry by his uncharitable remarks, which you will see were not approved of by the worthy secretary, Mrs. J. R. Lane. In her report she says: "Tuesday evening Mr. Andrus was introduced, and delivered an address on 'The Seen and the Unseen,' in which he endeavored to controvert all the ideas advanced by Mr. Babcock in the afternoon. This being a Liberal platform, and a united organization of Spiritualists and Liberalists, it would seem that a spirit of tolerance, at least, should be manifested each towards the other, and each should be willing to grant to the other the rights they claim for themselves. Bro. Andrus' address was good, but lacked charity."

Now, my friend Chapman, are not you, like Mr. Andrus, a little bigoted and lacking in charity? I think that I hav seen manifest too much bigotry among some of the Spiritualists, whilst there are others, noble souls, who are Liberal in every sense of the word. And I like them.

I fail to see why I should be accused of throwing clubs. I didn't even make mention of the name of Spiritualists in the article alluded to. I only spoke of gods, ghosts, devils, spirits, etc. The orthodox believe in all of this, so if I hit anyone it must hav been the orthodox who were the most hit, as they are the most in number. But I didn't intend to hit anybody. I hold that every one has as good a right to his opinions as I hav to mine, and I say that any religion that will make a man better than he is by nature is a good religion, if he will not make others miserable in trying to make himself happy.

I said that I could put a man in a glass jar, screw on the cover, and when the man died, Gabriel, if he wanted that soul, would hav to use a can-opener. Friend Chapman thinks differently. Well, he may be right and I may be wrong. It's only a difference of opinion. But of what use is a soul anyhow? If it won't help a man in this world how do we know that it will help a fellow in the next world? The body says, I'll go into a saloon and get drunk; the soul says, All right, I'll go with you. The man gets drunk, and pray tell me, if you can, which is it that's drunk, the body or the soul? The man stubs his toe and falls into the gutter. The souls which our friend says can get out of a glass can, in my judgment, should get out of that drunken beastly carcass if it is able to do so. But the soul refuses to leave the body, and on the morrow they hav another big drunk. Both are drunk together—body and soul.

Sometimes we see an idiot who don't know enough to chew gum. Now I say, in my judgment, it is unfair for God to stick a precious soul into such a miserable tenement of clay to become the laughing stock of others. It may be good so far as the poor pitiable idiot is concerned, but it is mighty tough on the soul.

Our prisons are filled with bodies and souls. If the soul controls the body, why didn't the soul keep the body from committing sin? If the soul did the sinning why not let the soul go to dust and save the body as being the best of the two?

Friend Chapman wants to know if I hav ever investigated. I say no. I never hav had an oppportunity. Nor hav I ever studied the dead languages. And yet I often express my opinion as to the propriety of teaching them in our common schools. Men who know a little Latin think me wild for talking about dead languages, and men who know a little about Spiritualism think me wild for talking about spirits. But men will talk, and why not? If somebody hadn't had the courage and goodness to hav differed with somebody in his opinions, this world would never hav made any progress. I don't care how much my ideas are combated. If I am wrong, the sooner I know it the better I shall like it. And I don't care if a Spiritualist believes in one spirit or a hundred spirits. I often hav said that their belief is more consistent than the orthodox, and I like them on account of the cold water they keep throwing on the orthodox hell. M. BABCOCK.

Has Man a Spirit?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Two articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, of Feb. 2d,—A reply to "A Little Lecture," by E. A. Chapman, and "The Idea of a Soul," by M. L. Sherman, M. D., suggest to me a few thoughts, for which please find space.

The question under consideration is not one for sarcasm or innuendo; it is philosophical, and only in this spirit should it be approached, or can it be discussed.

Does man continue to exist as an entity, an individuality, after death? If he does it behooves us to know it, and no course of investigation or study that claims to be able to lead us into the knowledge can be deemed beneath our dignity, or unworthy of prosecution.

We know we are, and we know the time has been when we were not. Man is projected forth into existence without any wish or desire on his part. He had no voice in the inception of his being. He was not questioned as to the circumstances he would desire should surround him before birth, at birth, and through life; which circumstances hav made him what he is. Appreciating these self-demonstrating facts, it is natural for man to say, "I know not why I am; can I discover what I will be?"

Gazing upon his surroundings, through long and weary years of intellectual development; seeing forms arise and perish; mountains sink beneath the sea, and giant waves roll back before the jagged peaks of new-born Alps; beasts, fierce and terrible, crunch their prey, and vanish into night; nations flourish as the green bay tree, then, scorched and dying, sink beneath the shriveling breath of time; beholding himself as fœtus, child, youth, man, and corpse; bowing before the law of change, a force that holds him in its grasp, that givs him life, then death, regardless of prayer or curse, this thought has been evolved, "I am but as the hill, the beast; as they liv, so I liv; as they die, so die I."

The only theory of matter that explains all the phenomena of the same is the atomic—that each atom is a union of matter and motion; that inertia is a lie; without motion, matter ceases to be, and without matter motion vanishes into nothingness. The two expressions of the same are inseparable; one cannot exist without the other. Matter is ever in motion, and can never be held in a state of rest.

The association or organization of these atoms presents to us the beauties of physical nature. As is the organization so will the expression be. The physical or material part of the atoms shows us the physical organization; the motion or force of the same, the moving or life principle which actuates or controls the organized body as a whole.

The atoms that compose a tree, dog, and man are similar, but as the organization of the man is more perfect, complex, higher, so is the expression or life of the same purer, nobler, more intellectual.

Now, as force cannot exist separate and apart from matter—and that it cannot science proves beyond the shadow of a doubt—what room or use have we for spirit? By what right do we assume that when death supervenes, a portion of this force separates itself from the material body, and exists through all eternity, independent of and yet preserving the identity of the individual it has left? that when a man dies he but shakes off the shackles of clay and is more alive than he was before? What is spirit? Either it is or is not matter. If it is matter, it is subject to the laws by which matter is governed; but the most delicate tests, the most patient investigations, fail to show the least modicum of spirit in man's organization, or the least room for its abiding-place.

"But," says one, "the spirit is the mind, the thinking part." Indeed, and what is the mind but a function of the brain, just as digestion is a function of the stomach? Injure the stomach and digestion is impaired. Destroy the stomach and digestion ceases. Injure the brain and the mind is impaired. Destroy the brain and the mind is gone.

Mankind has ever been prone to separate qualities or attributes from matter, first idealize and then worship the same. When asked to prove their imaginings real, the reply has usually been, "Heretic, Infidel, degrading Materialist."

Science does not profess to know all things, as yet, but what little she does know she is able to experimentally prove. If man were immortal it would be a scientific fact, and as such just as susceptible of demonstration as any other fact in physics. Hence we are justified in saying, "As all that is known of nature and nature's laws demonstrates that when a man dies his existence as a personality ceases, and he but lives in other forms of animal and vegetable life; and as Spiritualists are unable to bring any proof to the contrary, except human testimony, and manifestations that they admit tricksters can imitate, we are forced to the conclusion that the beautiful idea of immortality is a myth, and must be relegated to its proper place among the forgotten dreams of a dead past."

Until Spiritualists can demonstrate the fact of future conscious existence as clearly, practically, and unvaringly as the physicist can prove that the action of sulphuric acid on zinc will evolve electricity, or the union of oxygen and hydrogen will produce water, let them hesitate to dub themselves scientists or positivists, and rest contented among the great army of believers, grasping a pleasing, but unproved hope.

Spread the Truth.

To all who desire to dissolve the mists and fogs of religious superstition I hav a few earnest words to utter. When an unselfish person looks at the condition that the religious and political world are in, it seems to me that every feeling within him must stir him to make an earnest effort to giv to the people a higher and more enlightened kind of education. With all the light, so called, that men hav to-day, there is still a deplorable amount of ignorance all over the land. It is not surprising when we think of the thousands of years of the bloody teachings of old theology; and it will take many generations to outgrow the superstitions of the past.

What the people greatly need is a higher kind of reading. A very large part of the religious and political reading matter is rank poison, and the way the people devour it shows the moral condition they are in. We want in this country a million self-sacrificing men and women with an earnest, determined purpose to make an effort to giv to the people the grandest paper America ever had, and that paper is already in existence, and its name is THE TRUTH SEEKER. What its circulation is I do not know, but it ought to hav one hundred thousand paying subscribers.

When I think of the outrage on Mr. Bennett in putting him in prison when he has not done one single wrong act, but only defended our rights, as well as his own, my whole nature is stirred to its deepest depths at this indescribably damnable Christian villainy. Not one person in a million realizes the sublime hight D. M. Bennett occupies to-day. He is a moral hero; and to be a moral hero is infinitely above a military hero. Of the great mass of mankind, but few liv in history; but the name of D. M. Bennett is sure to be recorded as one of the brave souls who dared to maintain the right of the freedom of the press.

"Cupid's Yokes" is a grand production, and strikes a blow at the church's pet institution, Christian marriage. Comstock cared nothing for obscenity, for his whole nature is full of obscenity; but "Cupid's Yokes" and D. M. Bennett were hourly undermining the rotten old Christian church, and that is the reason the editor of the brave TRUTH SEEKER is in prison. Christians talking against obscenity! Is Satan rebuking sin?

THE TRUTH SEEKER was never so valuable as it has been for the last month; it is a paper that its readers ought to be proud of. The letter, "Marriage Discussed by a Freelover," is worth the price of the paper for a year, and such a woman ought to be proud to sign her full name. Most earnestly do I hope that it is not the last production from her inspired pen. Truly your friend,

Two Cents Gone to Thunder!

FRIEND EDITOR: Will you giv me space in the Investigator to acknowledge the receipt of two of John C. Bundy's papers, bearing date Oct. 25th and Nov. 8th? Did I know, or could I divine, the thoughtful individual who took so much interest in my reading matter as to send me two such useless Chicago papers, I would address him, or her, in terms suited to the event. But inasmuch as I can get no trace of the donor, I want to say to the considerate individual who forwarded the two copies that he wasted two one-cent stamps to no earthly purpose. Two cents "gone to thunder," which, judiciously used, with the intrinsic value of the paper, would have procured eight crackers, which crackers would have furnished two each to some poor woman and three hungry children. If this is not wasting "alabaster ointment," what on arth is? The papers were worn badly, and in this particular contrasted sadly with copies of the Index received at the time fresh from the office, and clearly marked "sample copy;" and in the same open way, from the same office, a copy containing the great Ellisonian exposé of the pretended Paine Memorial fraud and treachery, the re-hash or re-digging up of long ago refuted misstatements.

Now, friend Seaver, do let me say to those dear people that I hav heard of these complaints long since, and hav recorded long ago my convictions of the lives of Seaver, Mendum, Bennett, Bundy, Abbot, Benjamin, and Sara. I hav lived longer than either of them, and have my estimate of them, each and all; and I doubt if a whole edition of the Index or Philo-laco Journal would reflect any new light on these men and their general purpose of life. But, in the last case, it may be the design was to draw out some expression of opinion on Bennett. If this is correct, let me say that when I first saw the malignat exposé of Bennett, I said to myself he was weak; and in the first issue thereafter of THE TRUTH SEEKER Bennett himself said he was weak, thus verifying my words.

Let me just add, in conclusion, that I hesitate not to say, in my opinion, that men who, like Ellis, Bundy, and Abbot, will pursue any man or woman with the malignancy with which these men hav pursued Bennett, are moved by the most hateful, fiendish passions found in human nature—pride, avarice, and disappointed ambition. ## Those Unconstitutional Postal Laws.

The sober second thought begins to tell. There are people, and even judges, who begin to hesitate about sacrificing the liberties of the Press, Mails, and People to the obscenity scare. Never has anything filled us with more indignation than the ignorance, indifference, and cowardice with which our people, and especially some so-called Liberals, hav submitted to hav the Constitution treated as waste paper because otherwise thoughtless fanatics might falsely accuse them of favoring immorality. The question has lately been presented before the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the well-known Louisiana Lottery cases. An interesting account of these cases was recently published in the New York Herald. The noteworthy fact is that two judges hav dissented from the utter prostration of the Constitution and the liberties of the people to the fanaticism which has blindly carried these Laws hitherto through Congress and the Courts. Chief-Justice Cartter is one of the most venerable and conservative of judges. Many years on the bench hav given him great experience and a reputation rarely equaled for learning, fairness, and ability. If the Supreme Court had not hopelessly committed itself in the Jackson case there would be good reason to hope that the views of this learned and fearless judge would prevail in that, our highest, tribunal, especially under the masterly advocacy of Senator Carpenter, who has charge of the appeal.

But this is not all. Congress is hesitating too. When it began with these Comstock laws in 1873, and even until recently, all opposition was simply crushed out with an insolent air of injured holiness. Petitions and appeals to reason and the Constitution went for nothing. The only answer to remonstrants was, "Sir, do you pretend that the mails were designed to carry obscenity?"

The utter stupidity and irrelevancy of such a question is beginning to soak into the head of the average Congressman, for the Postmaster-General is after him with an enormous demand for new Legislation to enable him to perform effectively the new and terrible responsibilities these Laws place him under as the CENSOR of the morals and mail matter of the whole people of the United States. He is to judge what is obscene, immoral, fraudulent, or connected with lotteries, etc., and he is to withhold such correspondence as does not pass his muster from the persons to whom it is addressed. No wonder he wants Congress now to make out a specific moral and criminal code for him to execute by means of the Post-Office!

Can any one fail to see how ridiculous and absurd this all is under our Federal Constitution? The States are to punish crimes, not the Postmaster-General or his Deputies. The remedy has been, and can only be, effectively applied by State laws where the evils originate.

The duty of the hour is to help the people to see these Laws hav become a matter that concern the rights of every person. It must be impressed upon Congress by the new Petition, on the last page of our paper, and by letters, and in every other convenient way, that this prostitution of the Post-Office and of the general government to Fanaticism has gone too far, and that we must return to the Constitution.

The Defense Committee of this city hav lately re-issued the admirable speech of T. B. Wakeman at Faneuil Hall and his Reply to Judge Hurlbut, and hav circulated them largely in Washington. That these hav had a good and decided effect there we hav reason to believe. Congress, as the result of its second thought, has decided to lay over the new Legislation demanded, and indeed the whole matter, for further inquiry and consideration. Nothing can be more useful in the meantime than the circulation of Mr. Wakeman's unanswerable arguments. To this reissue of his speech the Committee hav also prefixed a letter which hits the nail on the head every time and with which we conclude this article. As a summary of the whole discussion, it is the word for the hour—a word of warning to be heeded:

MR. WAKEMAN'S LETTER.

93 NASSAU STREET, Jan. 26, 1880.

GENTLEMEN OF THE DEFENSE COMMITTEE: You request a few words to introduce a reissue of my Faneuil Hall Speech for general circulation.

1. As to the style and tone of that speech, I wish it to be remembered that it was delivered to an indignation meeting in the warmest sense of the term; and that any expressions, apparently disrespectful to the Courts or Judges or "Powers that be," must be allowed for in the same way that much was 'pardoned to the Spirit of Liberty' in the Abolition and Republican reviews of the Dred Scott decision.

2. As to the substance of the argument, I hav never heard any answer to it, and I do not believe that any can be made. The Federal Government of the United States is one of the powers specially granted and limited by the Constitution. The claim that, because these powers are exercised through Departments, therefore, it can use these Departments (e. g., the United States Postal Department) for any ulterior, political, moral, or criminal purposes it may fancy, is simply to throw away the Constitution and to giv the general government unlimited criminal and other jurisdiction, and, in the end, absolute power.

The second part of the argument is equally unanswerable, to wit, that this Legislation "abridges the freedom of the press," and, therefore, the liberty of the people. The Post-Office is the necessity of every civilized person and the principal means of publication. Every person has a free and equal right to its use and to the right of publication by it without prior restraint, espionage, or forfeiture of his property. He is liable for the abuse of these rights just as he is liable for other abuses, but he cannot be constitutionally deprived of them beforehand by a Postal Censorship established by Congress.

3. The importance of this subject is growing more apparent from day to day. Where the inch was usurped the ell is being taken. From supervision of "improper" matter, our Postal Censors hav included Lotteries, and they are now busily engaged upon the correspondence of the Brokers of Wall street. The plea of necessity, and a little public clamor to justify the extensions of this power, will place our "inviolable Post-Office" on a par with that of Russia. What is done through this Department can, and will be, done through the other Departments. The result will be inevitable. The consolidated, centralized, general Government means the Empire!

Let no one be deceived. In the end there can be no popular liberty unless the FEDERAL character of our Government is maintained. In Jefferson's words, we must cherish "the support of the State Governments in all their rights as the most competent administrators of our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against anti-Republican tendencies."

4. The only possible remedy now for the sacrifice and danger that these United States Postal Laws hav brought upon us is an appeal to the People and to Congress until their true character and danger is understood. The Courts—rather accidentally than otherwise, perhaps—hav placed themselves in a position (as they did in regard to the United States Bank, the Legal-Tender, and Slavery generally) in which no relief or safety can be expected from them. They hav made a precedent in the Jackson case that will ratify any claim that may be regarded as morally or otherwise desirable by the Departments.

Whether our Federal Government and our Liberties are to be preserved, or not, is again a question re-submitted to the People and their Congress, and in no way more decidedly than by the patent usurpations of these United States Postal Laws.

Very respectfully yours,
T. B. WAKEMAN.

Since the above was in type we are glad to learn that the second thought has reached the Post-Office Department itself! The Postmaster-General givs up the litigation. He does not find it so easy or so pleasant to become the PUBLIC CENSOR and withhold people's correspondence. We thought he was too much of a man for duties of this character. We are not surprised, but ask for consistency. Either let those laws be repealed, or get the man for the place—appoint Anthony Comstock Postmaster-General.

Blasphemy.

The Binghamton Daily Republican has this paragraph at the head of an editorial on "Demoralizing Literature:"

"One of our readers complains of the blasphemous issues of D. M. Bennett's press, which invade her circle of acquaintance, and desires to know if something cannot be done to suppress them."

We really do not know how D. M. Bennett can be suppressed. It is a large job. The Y. M. C. A. undertook it, through Comstock, and put Mr. Bennett into prison; but still he is not suppressed. He seems to be non-suppressible. They tried to frighten the printers, but the printers did not scarce, and the paper still is printed. They tried the binder, with the same success. They tried, through the post-office, to get his paper declared an advertising sheet, but he got that opinion reversed. Then they arrested him for blasphemy, but that failed. Then he was put through a Star-Chamber proceeding for obscenity, and shut up in prison; but still the paper comes out every week, and books are sold and sent all over the country every day. We hav no doubt that an infallible recipe for suppressing Mr. Bennett would be bought at a high price by the Y. M. C. A., Samuel Colgate, Anthony Comstock, or Howard Crosby. The Binghamton Republican candidly confesses that it does not know how—except by converting everybody to Christianity—to accomplish the task. If all the world were Christians they could kill him, which is about the only effectual way to suppress him. There is good reason to believe that they would like to do so now, but they do not dare carry their crime that far; but even then his paper would go on, and "the blasphemous issues of his press" would still penetrate the boundlessness of Christian hate. It is hard work to suppress an unsuppressible man like Mr. Bennett. Abbot and Bundy know that. Christian intolerance, free religious envy, and religio-philosophical meanness tumble back bleeding from every encounter. Honesty, courage, and a perfectly fearless determination to know and do the right, are hard to overcome. The church endeavored to stop the earth from revolving around the sun, but the earth went on and the church went down. The church said it was blasphemous to say the earth was not the Lord's flat footstool, but Magellan sailed around it and took a new stand. It threatened with eternal punishment all who said the world was not created 6,000 years ago. Science took its geologic hammer and hit that dogma on the head, and the birth was put back a few million years. When Servetus said that two persons could not possibly be one, and that the eternal father could not possibly hav an eternal son, he was burnt for his blasphemy. Servetus was suppressed, but the truth he gave to the world still lives. Roger Bacon exposed the vice of the clergy, and was put into prison for blasphemy. And this seems about what Mr. Bennett was incarcerated for. Because he showed that the clergy are no better, and a good many of them worse, than other men, he was selected as a victim. He must be suppressed. But the work was too stupendous. It was only half done, and we hear this plaintive wail: "Can't something be done to suppress his paper and his books?" The church cannot bear to hav the mask torn from her cruel face, and when it is done with a ruthless hand she kills, if she can, the destroyer. The hideousness revealed is too much for her votaries, and they cry to hav the mask replaced. It is not to be wondered at that they shudder at the picture revealed. Looking at the face, nothing but cruelty, tyranny, and lust can be seen. And they call the iconoclast "blasphemer," and clamor for his destruction.

"Blasphemy against God," they cry; but it is really against the priests and the church. Whoever denies that the clergy are the agents of God—his called and chosen ones—are guilty of blasphemy. The epithet, "sacrilegious wretch," is hurled at him, and for denying the divine mission of lustful men he is thrown into prison, or may be burned at the stake. Whoever first proclaims a new doctrine is a blasphemer against the old. When the new system is established it is blasphemy to doubt it. Jesus was a blasphemer, and was crucified. What is blasphemy at Rome is piety in London, and the religion of both is blasphemy in Constantinople. As Dryden says:

"This side to-day; to-morrow t'other burns,
And they 're all Gods Almighty in their turns."

Blasphemy is an attack on a reputation; but no one can ever make a worse attack on the reputation and glory of God than is made in the Bible. If that book were true God would be not only a cruel, heartless monster, but a brutal and lustful being, whose reputation no one could sully. Until that libel is withdrawn from circulation Christians can hav no case for blasphemy against any one who questions the wisdom or goodness of God. They themselves drew his picture. No one would ever dream he was so black if they had not painted him themselves. The artist should not find fault with the critic if he simply tells the truth. The critic is not to blame for the artist's failure. He should paint a better picture. If the Christians will giv us a God without any faults, a theology without any flaws, a priesthood without any sins, there will be no blasphemers.

As for suppressing D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is, as we before remarked, a large contract. The only way we know of is to borrow Gabriel's horn and toot up Torquemada. Jefferies Benedict and Matthew Hopkins Comstock do not seem equal to the task.

W. S. Bell.

We are pleased to learn that this earnest Liberal lecturer is about to make another trip West before the advent of warm weather. It is certainly a good indication to see our lecturers in the field, and kept constantly at work. The truths of Liberalism are certainly valuable enough to be dispensed in every practicable way. The lecture platform is a very effective point from whence to reach the public ear, and it must never be neglected. There are hundreds of thousands throughout this broad land who are anxious to hear the truth and to know what is right and what is wrong, on the great subject of religion, and who will go to hear a Liberal lecturer, but are hardly yet prepared to subscribe for a Liberal paper. Numberless conversions from superstition to Rationalism and truth are effected by Liberal lecturers. Let them be kept at work. Yes, let them be generously sustained. We hav the truths which the world needs and we must not keep them hidden. Every Liberal should feel willing to aid a little in giving these truths to the world.

We take especial pleasure in recommending Bro. Bell. We know him personally and well. He was arrested with us at Watkins, in August, 1878, for generously assisting us to sell our Liberal books. He is a good speaker, an intelligent Liberal, a genial companion, and a devotee in the cause of truth and reason. And what is still additional, he has been, and is, a steadfast friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was not one to join the enemy in efforts to crush it, but on all occasions has had words of sympathy and kindness to speak in its favor. He has said he was "proud to be known as a friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER," and THE TRUTH SEEKER, in return, is proud to be known as a friend to him. Both are laboring to impart the same valuable truths to our fellow-men, and we hav joined hands in this laudable effort.

We hope the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all earnest Liberals throughout the West, will giv Bro. Bell a kindly reception, that they will secure him to lecture in their neighborhoods, and that they will keep him at work, as busy as he can be, until the weather becomes too warm for public meetings. Let all good friends remember that a lecturer has to liv. It takes money to travel, and meet all necessary expenses, so let not the pocket-book be squeezed too tightly. He has good lectures prepared, on various subjects. The tastes of all can be suited.

He has received numerous complimentary notices from the press and individuals, some of which we take pleasure in appending to this notice:

W. S. Bell, of New Bedford, formerly a Methodist clergyman, lectured in Social Hall, on Sunday last, to a large audience. His entire effort was of a high order and well appreciated by a large and attentive audience. Mr. Bell is Radical in his convictions, bold and fearless in their utterence, yet debating every point with a fairness and philosophy that commend themselves to all.—Harwich (Mass.) Independent.

Mr. Bell is a fine speaker, a gentleman of culture, of pleasant address, and handles his theme in an able and masterly manner, engaging the attention of his hearers to the end, and then causing them to wish for still more of the same kind.—Susan H. Wixon, in Boston Investigator.

He is a man of varied experience, a good thinker, and a good speaker. Whatever society or committee that may engage him as a speaker will find that he is a man who has something to say, and can say it vigorously.—Rev. W. J. Potter, in Index.

Mr. Bell is an easy, fluent, and pleasing speaker, argumentative and humorous in right proportions, and as he warms up with his subject is forcible and eloquent.—Boston Investigator.

He is a good speaker, a perfect gentleman, a scholar, and well acquainted with the subjects on which he speaks.—One of his audience, in Ipswich Chronicle.

Mr. Bell is a profound thinker and an eloquent speaker. His points are clear and distinct, and he does not fail to convince.—Hull's Crucible.

Mr. Bell is a gentleman of fine scholarly attainments and a very pleasing speaker.—Banner of Light.

Mr. Bell is a pleasing speaker, polite to opponents, but, of course, radical in his views.—Marietta Register.

Bro. Bell is a first class speaker, and handles his subjects in a masterly manner.—Mrs. Frank Koehne, in Boston Investigator.

He is a gentleman of recognized superior ability, not only as a public speaker but in the use of his pen.—New Bedford Signal.

A Little Business.

We call the attention of our friends and readers to the generous offers we are making of books in connection with the paper. We hope all will take advantage of them to renew and to get new subscribers. We hav been sending the paper to a great many who were in arrears from three months to a year; but the past week we hav removed a good many from the list. We disliked to do this, because we feel that our friends want the paper; but the increase in expenses has forced us to do it. The white paper alone has gone up about fifty per cent. The business revival has helped us backwards, for it does not seem to hav reached our friends, or so many would not be in arrears. We trust they will take advantage of the offer we now make to renew; and if they want books they can get them cheaper in this connection than in any other way.

MOSES HULL announced, a week ago last Sunday, at the close of his first lecture before the Second Society of Spiritualists of this city, that on the following Sunday morning he should talk about angel ministration. All the angels and their friends, he said, were invited to attend. In the evening he should speak on the subject of devils. The devil and all his friends were invited to attend that lecture, for if the devil had never before had his due in New York, he would before that discourse was ended. Accepting the invitation thus rather ambiguously extended, a representative of THE TRUTH SEEKER was present. Mr. Hull was as good as his word. He recounted the triumphs of the devil from the start, how he gained possession of Adam and Eve as soon almost as they left the hands of their maker. It was true, he said, that Satan was condemned by the Almighty to crawl on his belly all the days of his life, but it seems that he retained that mode of locomotion for a short time only, as on the occasion of the family gathering, at which all the sons of God met together—and Satan came also among them—the latter stated in answer to a question from God that he came from walking up and down upon the face of the earth. This was only one out of a thousand cases which the speaker could mention where the devil had outwitted the opposition concern. Mr. Hull then recounted the triumphs and achievements of Satan in the line of discovery and invention, all of which reflected great credit upon his satanic majesty. In speaking of the trial of Galileo, Mr. Hull, by a lapsus linguæ, referred to the Index Expurgatorius as the Society for the Suppression of Vice. He considered the trial of the Florentine astronomer as the greatest judicial farce on record up to the time of D. M. Bennett's conviction before Judge Benedict. This comparison evoked considerable enthusiasm, and the speaker was encouraged by prolonged applause.

Mr. Hull spoke in Science Hall last Tuesday and Wednesday evenings on the conflict between labor and capital. His lectures before the Second Society of Spiritualists were more numerously attended than those of any other speaker employed by that society.

E. CAMPFIELD has taken an interest in the Mirror of Progress. It is a good paper. Mr. Campfield is a hard worker, and we wish them both abundant success.

THE Albany Ledger Standard prints Mr. Bennett's letter to Hayes. The Standard appreciates pluck when it sees it.

WE are indebted to friend Mendum for a large and very fine lithograph of Thomas Paine. We fittingly put it up as a background for the bust of Colonel Ingersoll. It is a good portrait of a grand man, and if anybody wants one just like it they can hav it for one dollar.

AT last we find space for the letters of T. B. Wakeman and F. E. Abbot to the Paine celebration at Boston. They hav been crowded out for two weeks, but the contrast between them is too good to lose. Our readers will not fail to appreciate it.

Amy Post to F. E. Abbot.

ROCHETER, N. Y., FEB. 17, 1880.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, My once respected Friend: I hav received a printed circular, purporting to be a certified copy of the records of a meeting of the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League of America, held Dec. 12. 1879

This copy of the records is not graced by the name of a President, Secretary, or any member of the board, nor vouched for by any name whatever; but on the margin I find these words written: "Dear Madam, your opinion on the subjoined is invited. F. E. Abbot." Therefore I shall address my reply to the editor of the Index.

Your first perplexity seems to be concerning the name of your League; even the imposing name of America, does not seem to distinguish it sufficiently from the honored original to satisfy you. This does not surprise me, seeing you hav made such tremendous effort to giv it a bad name. You charge us with "active propagandism of demoralizing and licentious theories, and support of officers and other representatives who are on good grounds believed to hav been guilty of gross immoralities, that it has thereby unfitted for use for any organization which desires the support of friends of natural morality."

I wish you had defined the meaning of "natural morality" so that we could understand your special status of morals. Surely, judging by the spirit and matter of your circular, it must be very much lower down in the scale than our own.

The charges you prefer against us do not belong to our Liberal League; we hav no soil in which they can take root; therefore I hurl them back to the foul pit of their origin, where they seem to grow and flourish so luxuriantly, producing in your minds such bitter and obscene fruit.

The character of our League, I believe, will stand higher in the estimation of the public than those who by falsehood hav sought to injure it.

I hereby take this opportunity to demand that you immediately expunge my name from your roll of vice-presidents.

You certainly must hav known that in your hegira at Syracuse you had no right to take my name with you, for it was no secret that I unhesitatingly remained with the original National Liberal League.

In the spirit of free speech, free press, and free mails, I remain as ever, trusting that the right will come uppermost,

AMY POST.

Letter from Mrs. Slenker.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS AND FREEDOM LOVERS: "Richard is himself again." The long suspense is over. All hope of justice being done is dead, and our brave leader comes out in his "Seventh Letter from Albany" with the old, defiant ring in his telling words and with that vim and vigor that used to mark his editorials and giv to them that magnetic influence which reached every heart and made his readers, far and near, his warm, true, and sympathizing personal friends. His letter to R. B. Hayes, in the last TRUTH SEEKER, is just the thing.

My object in writing this note is, first, to say this; and, secondly, to urge all who can do so to start out immediately with petitions for freedom of speech and inviolability of the mails and get all the signatures possible; and those who are unable to do this should help defray the expense of some one who can and will do it.

Only a few hours after reading the stirring "Reasons for a New Petition," we sought out a man well qualified for the work and offered him good wages for obtaining signatures and sent him on his mission with earnest wishes for success. I hope every one will do his level best, and that we shall be able to roll up the biggest list of names ever yet offered to Congress for any purpose whatever. Ours is a great and noble object, and one that should be dear to the heart of every American citizen.

Snowville, Va., Feb 22, 1880. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Retreat of the Post-Office Department.

There is much surprise over the retreat of the Post-Office Department from its position in regard to lotteries. To-day it rescinded its order so far as it affected the Louisiana lottery. The suprise is the greater from the fact that it was against this very firm that the Department won its case a few days since in the Supreme Court of this district after a prolonged contest. No reasons that seem to cover the case hav as yet been made known.—N. Y. Herald.

For Michigan Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The annual meeting of the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Michigan will be held at Battle Creek, March 22d to 30th. All who are in favor of the platform of the National Liberal League are requested to attend, in order to establish a plan for united work. Let every auxiliary League in the state send one delegate at least. There is considerable important business to come up, and we want as many to be present as possible. Let Michigan be an encouragement to the Liberals of other states.

C. H. DUNNING,
Chairman Ex. Com. N. L. L. for Michigan.

Marcellus, Mich., Feb. 25, 1880.

Clerical Cowardice.

EDITORS STATE JOURNAL: The following correspondence will in a great measure explain itself, but I deem it proper under the circumstances to add a few words by way of comment:

PARKERSBURGH, W.VA., Jan. 31, 1880.

REV. A. C. GEORGE, D.D.,
REV. J. W. CARTER, D.D.,

Gentlemen: Having been informed that the clergy of this city hav a regular organization which meets weekly, on behalf of the Committee of the Liberal League, I inclose you the within communication, with the request that you lay it before that body at its next regular meeting, and oblige, Very respectfully, Your obedient servant,

JAMES HUTCHINSON,
Secretary Liberal League.

TO THE REVEREND CLERGY OF THE CITY OF PARKERSBURGH, W.VA., Gentlemen: Since the recent lecture of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll in this city, most of you hav delivered discourses upon the inspiration of the Bible and the pernicious influences of unbelief upon the morals of society, and we are informed some of you, in your zeal, hav so far forgotten the great cardinal principles of charity as to denounce those you call Infidels as enemies of humanity.

Now, gentlemen, if you are so confident of the divine origin of the Bible, and the necessity of the Christian religion for the happiness and salvation of mankind, it is presumed that you will not object to a discussion of their merits in public; and at the request of a number of gentlemen who differ from you in your views upon the subject, we respectfully invite yon to appoint a committee of your own body, consisting of three or four persons, to confer with a similar number of gentlemen representing the Liberal League of this city, to make suitable arrangements for a joint discussion between some chosen member of your faith and one of ours. Truth has nothing to fear from free investigation, and if the Bible is the word of God, you certainly can hav no apprehension as to the result of the severest scrutiny into the history of its origin and character; while we believe that a free and candid discussion of the great fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion can but lead to the triumph of truth and the advancement of civilization.

If you accept or reject our proposition, please advise the undersigned. Very respectfully,

S. E. Kuykendall,
Barna Powell,
James Hutchinson,
F. K. Stagg,
Committee.

To James Hutchinson, Secretary of the Liberal League, Dear Sir: We hav received, through you, a paper, dated Jan. 31, 1880, signed by "S. E. Kuykendall, Barna Powell, James Hutchinson, and F. K. Stagg, Committee," addressed to us, it is claimed, "at the request of a number of gentlemen," and proposing a joint arrangement between the clergy and the "Liberal League of this city," for the discussion of the question of "the divine origin of the Bible and the necessity of the Christian religion."

We agree with these gentlemen in the statement that "truth has nothing to fear from investigation;" and we hav no idea that the holy scriptures can, by any possibility, be subjected to any severer scrutiny in the future than that to which they hav been subjected in the past; and history shows us that civilization advances with the increase and triumph of the gospel. How we may most effectually promote and extend amongst men the Christian religion, is, therefore, with us, the matter of primary importance. We are satisfied that this can be most successfully accomplished by the diligent performance of our duties as ministers—by preaching the doctrines and morality taught in the Bible, by extending church organization and influence, by visiting, aiding, and comforting the sick and the poor, and by striving generally to advance the well-being of our fellow-men; and not by engaging in discussions respecting long-established truths with those who are actively and persistently hostile to the Christian faith.

You will pardon us, gentlemen, for the frank statement that we do not regard the Liberal League and its operations as being, by any means, the chief obstruction, in this community, to the progress of Christianity. We do not propose, therefore, to bestow upon it and its measures of opposition to the truth of God any more attention than their relative importance demands.

Your assumption, gentlemen, that if we hav confidence in the truth of Christianity we will not object to a discussion, in the manner which you propose, does not rest on a sufficient foundation. We believe in representative government, in social purity, in the sanctity of the household, in freedom of thought, and in the equal rights of all men; but we would not feel at liberty to turn aside from our regular ministerial work to discuss these principles with any person who might deny or assail them. We can more effectually counteract all false statements and doctrines by persistently teaching and preaching that gospel which "makes for righteousness," which works the destruction of all evils, which comprehends all reforms, and which secures, with its triumph, every blessing to mankind.

It is not true, as you intimate in your communication, that we hav denounced "Infidels as enemies of humanity," or that we hav made any personal attacks on individuals or classes. But it is our duty as ministers to deliver discourses on the inspiration of the Bible and the pernicious influence of unbelief on the morals of society; and we shall probably continue to do this in the future, as we hav in the past, when the occasion, in our judgment, demands it. And the men who sustain Robert G. Ingersoll in his virulent assaults on the Christian faith and Christian ministers cannot, with a very good grace, it seems to us, complain of the clergy as violators of "great cardinal principles of charity," if they not only present the gospel to men as the light of the world and the saving power of society, but also denounce Infidelity as a blight on civilization and a curse to mankind.

For the reasons stated in this communication, as well as for others, weighty and conclusive, which might be mentioned, we respectfully decline your proposition.

Signed in behalf of the Preachers' Meeting, Feb. 2, 1880.
Loyal Young, Sec'y. J. T. Whitley, Pres.

COMMENTS.

Ever since Colonel Ingersoll's lecture in this city the clergy, as a general thing, hav, directly or indirectly, commented upon the lecture, or the views expressed in it upon the inspiration of the Bible and the influence of Christianity on the advancement and enlightenment of the human race.

In these discourses of the clergy those who disbelieved in the Bible as the Word of God hav been held up in a very unenviable light, and one distinguished gentleman intimated that Infidels were destitute of all moral sense, and must necessarily commit murder or come to some bad end. Owing to these facts, as well as the advantages possessed by the clergy of enunciating their creeds and doctrines from the pulpit in the name of the Lord, without the possibility of having their declarations reviewed or called into question, the members of the Liberal League proposed a joint discussion, wherein each party could hav a fair opportunity to present their respective views in a calm and dispassionate manner for the consideration of the people. They simply proposed that reason and argument should be laid before the minds of the people and let them determine. There are a large number of ladies and gentlemen in this community who hav conscientious doubts about the Bible being the inspired word of God. They are just as honest and sincere in their convictions as any member of the clergy.

This reply of the clergy is a tacit confession of the truth of what I hav repeatedly stated, that "they know that the creeds and dogmas of the church cannot stand the scrutinizing gaze of impartial investigation and discussion." That religion appeals simply to the fears and superstitions of mankind instead of reason and argument. No longer than last night a member of the Preachers' Association discoursed learnedly about the difficulties of Infidelity from his pulpit, where he knew that he was beyond the reach of reply. This learned gentleman, in his sermon, proclaimed it as an established fact that "the world is indebted solely to the Bible for its morality," entirely ignoring the fact that the nations of antiquity, long before the birth of Moses, had well-established governments, founded upon moral codes, as just and equitable for the protection of the rights of persons and property and the suppression of vices and crime as anything in the Bible; and so to this day hav the so-called heathen nations of China, India, and Japan.

The doctor also insisted that Infidels, by rejecting the Bible, "were destitute of all moral obligation or were without a basis of moral action." The doctor, in his zeal, probably forgot that Bishop Butler, Dr. McCosh, and other authorities upon morals, concede that man by nature is endowed with a conscience which approves or disapproves of his conduct, and that "this faculty tends to restrain men from doing mischief to each other and leads them to do good." The great bishop says: "Man was made for society and to promote the happiness of it." "The nature of man leads him to a right behavior in society—to that course of life which we call virtue. Men follow or obey their natures to a certain degree, but not entirely. Their actions do not come up to the whole of what their natures lead them to."

And Doctor McCosh says that "conscience may be considered a law of our nature—an original and divinely-implanted and fundamental law." And he quotes approvingly the well-known passage from Cicero, who says: "Right reason is itself a law congenial to the feelings of nature, diffused among all men—uniform, eternal—calling us imperiously to our duty and peremptorily prohibiting any violation of it. Nor does it speak one language at Rome and another at Athens, varying from place to place or from time to time, but it addresses itself to all nations, to all ages, deriving its authority from the common sovereign of the universe, and carrying home its sanctions to every breast by the inevitable punishment which it inflicts on the transgressors." This monitor is placed within the breast of every man, Infidel as well as Christian, teaching what is right and declaring what is wrong—an unerring guide to the children of men in all their relations and duties as members of society, so long as they keep it free and untrammeled by the creeds and dogmas of priests and churches."

In conclusion, as the clergy, ensconced behind the sanctity of the pulpit, are constantly denouncing those who differ with them, as enemies of society and the Bible, as the word of God, I wish to ask them a few questions for their future consideration, viz.: How is it that this Bible, while professing to be the inspired word of God, a divine revelation in regard to man's life in a future world, is so entirely destitute of information upon this professedly all-important subject? Where, through its thousand pages, is there one solitary fact concerning the condition of man in the life to come? Why is it so silent in regard to the state of existence beyond the grave? It furnishes no facts, but simply deals in metaphors, parables, and dreamy views, the product of man's own frail and deluded imagination. It is true that it dwells at great length in describing a paradise where there is no death, yet in which the tree of life grows luxuriantly on each side of a stream of living waters for the healing of the nations. A new Jerusalem, a golden city, the breadth, the length, and the heighth of which are equal, with streets paved with gold as transparent as glass, and protected by walls of jasper and other precious stones, and gates of pearl that are never shut by day (?), although there is no night there.

These are not facts but the wild visions of a diseased or distorted imagination, the vagaries of a mind lost to all but sensual pleasures. Pray what use has a spiritual body for a golden city, paved with precious metals and surrounded by jasper walls and gates of pearl? Again I ask, where does this presumptuous book solve the greatest of all mysteries, the origin of evil, and the incongruities and perplexities which beset men on all sides in the moral government of this world? Is there a thoughtful person in this community that has not felt bewildered and almost crazed at the, at least, apparent inconsistency of the existence of such a world as this, with its sorrows and crimes, under the domain of an all-wise, all-powerful, and all-merciful God, as set forth in the scriptures? Can it be possible that such a God can view with impunity the triumph everywhere of evil over good, of vice over virtue, of the corruption, the baseness, and degradation everywhere abounding? the never-ceasing tales of innocence corrupted, of villainy successful, of the poor robbed, and the weak oppressed? If not, why are these things so? Who can reconcile them with this rule of an almighty and all-loving heavenly father? Is his ear heavy that he cannot hear? Are his eyes blind that he cannot see? Is his hand shortened that he cannot save the people from the wretchedness, misery, and crime that everywhere prevail, saddening the hearts of men?

When the Christian clergy shall hav answered these questions, and relieved the world from some of its sorrows and tears, it will be time enough for us doubters to espouse their creeds and dogmas. In the mean time we will exert all our efforts to extend the influence of that philosophy which teaches scientific truths as the only available divine providence, instead of the egotism of faith; and concentrate all our labors towards fitting man for the duties and responsibilities of the life that now is, and accepting reason as our sole guide, and human usefulness and happiness as the only worthy criterion of right and wrong.

Respectfully, James Hutchinson,
Feb. 9, 1880. Sec. Liberal League.

Book Notices.

A New Theory of Life and Species.—Published by J. B. Pool, Pittsfield, Mass.

This little volume is quite interesting, and the theory of life it presents is ingenious, whether it be correct or not. It presents the theory that the sun occasionally ceases to giv out light and heat, and that its cycles may be divided into four seasons:

1. When the sun is entirely dark and cold.
2. That immediately following the illumination of the sun, when the ice begins to melt and icebergs to move on the ocean.
3. The icebergs being melted, the sun's heat is felt all over the earth.
4. When the sun wanes and cold again extends.

At each glacial epoch life is destroyed, and when the earth is fitted again for life it is furnished with life germs from some spirit world where life already exists. This theory may be satisfactory to those who believe in spirits, and those who do not may feel an interest in hearing all sides fairly presented.

The price of the book is fifteen cents, but having been presented by the author with a package of them, I will sell them for ten cents in stamps and with the proceeds pay for three-month subscriptions to The Truth Seeker wherever I think it will do the most good. One paper will often Liberalize a whole neighborhood, and we cannot do good work in any more effective way than in spreading the circulation of The Truth Seeker—a paper that is better calculated to win the hearts of its readers than any other paper of its kind. Respectfully, Elmina D. Slenker.

Sixteen Saviors or None; or the Explosion of a Great Theological Gun. An answer to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One;" an examination of its Fifteen Authorities, and an Exposition of its Two Hundred and Twenty-four Errors. By Kersey Graves. New York: D. M. Bennett, Liberal Publisher.

Mr. Graves has in this volume, in his usual strong and pointed manner, reviewed his reviewer, and rather turned the sword that was raised to slay him toward the man that held it. It having been stated by Mr. Graves's critics that his works contain numerous errors, he agrees to forfeit five hundred dollars to any one who shall succeed in finding one error, or one important statement in them not corroborated by reliable historical authority. And he offers the same sum to Mr. Perry if he will show him another work on theology of equal size with his own "Sixteen Saviors or One," containing as many erroneous statements. Here is a fine opportunity for those who charge mistakes and misrepresentations upon those who are laboring to undermine the foundations of popular errors to prove the truth of their assertions and make money—if they can. The readers of Mr. Graves's "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," "The Bible of Bibles," and his other writings, will find in this volume some pretty sharp thrusts at modern bigotry.—Banner of Light.

Can that be true religion which consigned men of holy innocence to the flames because they held that the Son was like unto the Father, but not the same as the Father, or because they would not worship the Virgin and the saints? Can that be true religion which screened nameless crimes behind the sacred walls of monasteries? Can that be true religion which taught eternity of punishment without any hope of pardon or salvation for the sinner, however penitent? People who judge of religions in that spirit will never understand their real purport—will never reach their sacred springs.—Max Muller.

Letters from Friends.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Please pardon me for neglecting so long to write. Inclosed I send you $5. I hav not as yet written you the feelings of the Liberals of this place with regard to your case and course. As far as I know, they are with you to a man; even for the mistake that you hav made they hav not gone back on you, for you owned up like a man. I hav heard it said that honest confession is good for the soul. If no one goes back on you only those that hav never made a mistake, you will hav a world of friends. As a general thing, every man and woman knows more mean things about themselves than any one else knows about them; and if each one would only think for a minute about the mistakes that he has made, the stones would all fall to the ground before they reached you. This would apply to Abbot and Bundy.

I stopped taking the R.-P. Journal long ago on account of its abuse and slang about other Liberals, and those, too, who had worked for the Journal. And now it has turned against D. M. Bennett because he is a better man than the editor of the Journal and publishes a paper that the Liberals like better than they do his.

Any man that will slander another considers the man that he slanders a better man than himself and tries to get him down as low as he is himself. But Bro. Bennett's name will stand written on the scroll of fame while his learned opposers will be sunken to merited oblivion. His works hav gone all over the civilized world, and cannot be destroyed or answered any more than Thomas Paine's can. That is why they hate him, for he tells so much truth and tells it in such a way that they cannot forget it.

I am glad that there are so many Liberals who stand by you in your trouble. There are not words in the English language that will express the feelings of contempt that I hav for Comstock, Colgate, Benedict, and others that sent you to prison. Yours in true friendship,

DEAR BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 22d of November, containing your "Fourth Letter from Albany," has been duly received, and I can assure you that this, your "Fourth Letter," is the only thing I ever saw from your pen that I could not indorse. Your correspondence with "Hannah" was strictly a private affair, and could not constitute a crime against the public, consequently it is none of the public's business. The little domestic storm it had created passed away and perfect harmony had been established in your family, and right then and there the matter should hav ended; and it would hav ended then and there had it not been for your rivals, Bundy and Abbot, who, it seems, were more successful in finding out "what was the matter with Hannah" than yourself. Bundy and Abbot hav certainly "beat you to the Yank;" and the weakest act on your part was, in my estimation, your notice of their low, sneaking, cowardly assault; you should never hav given the matter even a passing notice. Anything emanating from Comstock or his man Friday, viz., F. E. Abbot, or John Bundy, or their Dulcinia, Hannah, should never meet anything except silent contempt. I well remember, when a boy, my father never suffered me to wrestle with a negro or fight dogs with a rolling-pin.

You seem to apprehend that your friends will go back on you because Bundy and Abbot hav resurrected some unpleasant correspondence between you and Hannah, and you go on to beg the forgiveness of your friends and patrons for your weakness and indiscretion, as though any of us had anything to do with your private life. It is your public life and labor in the Liberal cause that claim our attention, and in that you hav given no grounds for complaint; but, on the other hand, you justly merit the love and unbounded esteem of the Liberal world; you still stand the champion hero of the Freethought warfare. True it is, some few pseudo, "milk-and-cider" Liberals may turn their backs on you on account of Hannah, but your true Liberal friends will never forsake you until you offend them in a public capacity.

I hope, my dear old friend, that you will, as far as possible, forget this whole affair. You are too noble and generous to ever beg forgiveness for anything that Comstock, Bundy, Abbot, or Hannah can ever bring against you.

I must close. This is the third letter that I hav written you since you went to Albany. Oh, how about Underwood? Do you remember that I said in a communication to you about a year ago that Abbot and Underwood were aiding and abetting Comstock in his damnable persecutions? I guess you now see how it is. Good-bye. R. M. CASEY.

VAN BUREN, ARK., Jan. 5, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: For fear you will think that the returns from this back country are against you, I now send said returns in, and am happy to say that the majority are in favor of Mr. Bennett continuing as the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As Bundy and Abbot failed to send me any of their papers, I sent for a copy of Bundy's orthodox Comstock Journal containing your letters. Though in his editorials I found they were horrible, in the letters themselves I failed to find anything that I thought ought to hang a man.

I guess Abbot and Bundy thought they had struck a bonanza in the way of subscribers to their papers, but I don't think it will "pan out" so well as thought; in fact, I doubt if it turns out enough clear cash to pay McNellis & Co. for their claims.

I don't think you need to bother any more with that team of Spanish jackasses, Abbot and Bundy, while they hav such a master to cudgel them as Eugene Macdonald or Theron C. Leland, besides said team will get tangled up in the gear with each other before long and kick themselves and each other to death. As dirty a couple as they are cannot remain long in peace in the same house; they are too selfish and jealous-natured to last long in partnership. So, as low as making shoes in a penitentiary seems, it is exalted work when compared to such dirty work as the above firm are engaged in.

I think, instead of the Liberals telling you to step down and out, that the other side will be silently requested to step down and out by the still small voice of falling subscription lists. They may get some subscribers from among the Christians, and it is nothing but right that they should, for who ought to support a Christian paper but Christians? And if they don't support their own papers, I don't think the Liberals will consider themselves under any obligations to support them.

I see that B. F. Underwood has been so ungrateful as to turn his back on you after your being so kind as to publish so many kindly notices and comments of his lectures and debates. This looks like the snake that the woodman carried to his house and warmed in Æsop's Fables.

I must again vote nay to your stepping down and out. I want to see some more of your sledge-hammer blows dealt out to the enemies of humanity.

Your subscriber while THE TRUTH SEEKER lamp holds out to burn, JAMES R. NEAL.

BURWOOD, CAL., Dec. 31, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find money order for thirteen dollars, and a one-dollar greenback as a New Year's present for Mrs. Bennett from my wife. Please send me your new book, entitled "Ancient Gods and Ancient Faiths," as soon as it is published, also R. G. Ingersoll's book, "Some Mistakes of Moses," and a life-size lithograph of Ingersoll, and giv me credit for another year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. What is left of the order please accept for yourself.

My wife and myself are Liberals in every sense of the word. Consider us as your friends, and we will make as many more for you as we can by advocating Freethought and circulating your paper, which is like gold to every lover of liberty.

I will close by wishing you as happy a New Year as you could expect in your so-called Christian prison.

Ever your friend, C. BLIVEN.

MILTON, UTAH, Jan. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: Not being one of the "cultured consensus of the competent," of course I am, as I hav been from the beginning, with you, and say, Never think for a moment of the idea of "stepping down and out," neither as editor of the best Freethought paper in the world nor as vice-president of the National Liberal League. Mankind cannot afford any such thing; and if such able and clear sighted contributors to your paper as Mrs. Denton, E. C. Walker, "Tee Cee Lee," and a host of others, are the tag-rag and bobtail, I am indeed very desirous of being counted in.

I saw a copy of the Religio-Philosophical not long since. I read the paper regularly seven or eight years ago. It then directed my attention to Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, through the continual abuse and slander of the editors of that paper. I read a few copies of the Weekly and found therein some very good ideas expressed upon the social question. Before long the very religious philosopher, Jones, then editor of the R.-P. Journal, who felt so outraged about what he philosophically denominated Freelove, or, more often, free lust, was shot and killed in his office for seducing a friend's wife. Victoria Woodhull had been arrested, and the agitation of the social question probably thought ended. You, Bro. Bennett, are in a Christian institution to-day through the zeal and aid from the religious philosopher, Bundy, and the Index's Abbot and Comstock, under the pretext that you favor Freelove; and as there is again such howling about your having written some letters to a girl, it is but reasonable to suppose that there was something very nasty going on somewhere. I hav noticed as a fact that whenever a man sets himself to correcting others for some particular or imaginary fault or sin—for dishonesty, impurity, etc.—that man is very often to such a degree guilty of the very thing himself—that of all howlers he cries the loudest, thereby trying to divert people's attention from himself.

The social question, so inseparably connected with the labor question and the welfare of our common humanity, is one that will require more martyrs like yourself to face before it will be solved; but the solution must come. How noble in you to suffer for another man's "right to differ with you in opinion."

Inclosed find $2 50, subscription on THE TRUTH SEEKER. As one among the thousands of your warm friends, admirers, and well-wishers, I subscribe myself, L. P. EDHOLM.

CAMARGO, ILL., Jan. 28, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Friend: I hav to inform you of the death of our friend, Charles Wellaver, one of the first subscribers to your paper. He lived a consistent Liberal (as he told me) from his earliest recollection until last Friday, having reached over three-score and ten years. None of his acquaintances (so far as I hav heard) ever questioned his honesty, truthfulness, or integrity in any particular. We extend to his bereaved wife and family our sympathy and condolence in their loss, acknowledging that sooner or later death is as necessary as birth is to all organized life. Peace to his ashes!

I hav consulted all the Liberals here as to D. M. Bennett's "stepping down and out." The universal voice is, "No, never! Continue your place as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER." Friend Macdonald, you hav proved yourself a success as an editor—hav fully maintained the character of THE TRUTH SEEKER as being one of the best Liberal papers in the country; but the old martyr we cannot and do not want to spare. We also say the same of A. L. Rawson.

W. H. PEARCE.

FOREST HILL, MICH., Feb. 17, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: It has not been for want of sympathy for our brave martyr now in his cell in the Christian bastile at Albany, nor the cause which he so nobly and fearlessly represents, that I hav not long since contributed my mite of sympathy which he so richly deserves, but because I hav seen that the letter department has been well supplied and by far abler pens than mine. I may as well own up that I hav been "hard up" for money. Liberals out here are generally men of small means but of good common sense. Let not Bro. Bennett for one moment think of abandoning the editorship of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is ably conducted at present and entirely satisfactory to its many patrons, but by all means let the great captain of the ship hav control of the vessel. Shame! shame! on the League, or the man that will advise anything else! Who ever heard of a man in the world but what acted a little imprudent once in his lifetime? The name of D. M. Bennett will be emblazoned high upon the scroll of fame when his relentless persecutors will hav sunk into merited oblivion. I took the R.-P. Journal for several years, but when it began to slop over with hypocritical "gush," I dropped it. May your paper long liv to pour grape and canister into the ranks of the enemy, with Mr. Bennett at its head, is the desire of E. P. JOHNSON.

BELOIT, OHIO, Jan. 6, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I am one of the 70,000 that circulated the petition for the repeal of the Comstock law, and signed it. Also a petition for D. M. Bennett's release, and sent it in in due time, with over two hundred names on it. I am an old man, past seventy-three years, and hav always been a Freethinker and Abolitionist. I hav been persecuted, and hav frequently been threatened with prosecution. I wish to be considered a friend of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails, and the secularization of the government.

I hav read Mr. Bennett's "Fourth Letter from Albany." It is manly and truthful, and I admire him the more for it, and sympath'ze with him very much, and think he should not hav resigned the vice-presidency of the National Liberal League.

I sent for the "Champions of the Church" and "Cupid's Yokes" last January, and received them in good time with the wrappers very much torn. The "Champions" is a noble work, and should be in every family. "Cupid's Yokes" I hav read, but don't indorse all of it, but fail to see any obscenity there. Many of my neighbors hav read it, and all that hav expressed themselves to me on it say they fail to see any obscenity in it.

Inclosed you will find post-office order for six dollars, to be disposed of as directed.

I am decidedly in favor of Mr. Bennett's sticking to the paper. Yours, for equal rights and justice,

WILLIAM B. MICHENER.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I too hav been "settin" in mute meditation, suspending judgment, "for I do so want to keep on the side of popularity." But brother Bennett the truthful has spoiled our chance, and we are here this first day of January, 1880, the first lines that we hav penned preparing to decide the case after all the arguments hav been discussed and confession recorded. I always thought Beecher a great coward when he testified, "She thrust her affections upon me." Poor man! But I excused him, as he had pretended to accept the Bible, and was following old Adam—"She did tempt me and I did eat."

Now the case seems to me to be that Bundy, Abbot, Comstock, and all the evangelical priests, with Bennett included, hav been studying the fountain source of obscenity, hav read and re-read that debauching record of love and nonsense, Solomon's Song, that is found recorded in the history of the past, dubbed sacred scriptures, holy Bible, book of God. When will people consent to letting people liv their lives without trying to force love by compelling every one to put on each other's coat of many colors—the coat of legal perfection? Alas! the garment has been turned and made over out of the fig-leaf apron of respectability until its worn edges will not hold it together, and it falls to pieces from inherent rottenness.

Will we, as Liberals, ever become liberal enough to uphold the true attraction of male and female without suspecting that something more has been done than was apparent from those letters? How foolish it is for people that hav outgrown the myths and dogmas of the past to forever lend their influence to uphold an institution run by priests and lawmakers, that ignore nature and allow the most abominable abuses of conjugal life to exist, even after it has been laid bare to the public gaze for centuries, when men and women hav been driven to despair by the great wrongs of legalized prostitution, being driven to murder and suicide to find release from their miseries. But the time will come when we can accept the ethical law laid down by the reverend lawbreaker Abbot, called the Third Law of Rationalism. "Hail the day" when I feel competent to decide that a man that can break his own laws 5,000 times, and insult the good sense of the Liberals of this country by sending them broadcast, is in a worse fix than if he had sent "Cupid's Yokes" through the mails and got to "dwelling in humble privacy"—where he truly belongs.

I hope Bennett will retain his place as editor, and liv to deal sledge-hammer blows for truth, as he has done in the past. I do not think he will engage in the despicable business of printing private letters.

Jamieson has done the "Spiritual saints" brown. We are sure to outgrow the dead past.

"Little by little the world grows strong,
Fighting the battle of right and wrong;
Little by little the wrong gives way,
Little by little the right has sway."

Let all good people work for that day, is the desire of an AGED MOTHER.

CLIFTON, KAN., Jan. 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: You will see by the above address that I hav removed for an indefinite time from my former home in Oregon, Wis., and am now visiting and staying with my children and relatives in different parts of Kansas.

Many of my friends requested me to write and giv my views concerning Kansas, but could venture to say but little at present. I will say this much: I think it best for any person who thinks of coming to Kansas to make a permanent home, to move cautiously and think two or three times before they make a move.

While stopping at Johnson county, Kan., I saw an agent soliciting means for the destitute in Ness county. There were five counties lying southwest of the Kansas River that had committees of three for each county gathering provisions, money, store goods, old clothes, or anything that would relieve them from their sufferings. The agent that I talked with from Ness county said that the railroad managers were prevailed with to carry the freight at half rate on the first car-load, but after that refused to carry unless they were paid full rates. Then the agent, Robert Findlay, appealed to the governor and others to bring their influence to bear upon the railroad officials to induce them to carry to those poor, destitute people at half rates, and the result is yet to hear from.

It is said it was on account of the drought and hot winds that the crops failed in those southwestern counties. The crops in the northeastern part of Kansas are good, but the price of transportation is reducing the people to serfs and slaves. The national and state authorities should take this transportation question in hand and do something for the people to prevent the railroad monopolies from carrying on a system of legalized robbery.

I would like to say something on the Liberal funeral discourse made at the Methodist church at Clifton on the death of my son-in-law, J. P. Noble, but time and space forbid. The Liberal League movement is progressing here in the West, and I expect to help form a League in this place.

Yours for truth and justice, JOHN C. HANAN.

ROME CITY, IND., Jan. 1, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER: We hav no Leagues here, but there are a few persons in this immoral, orthodox town who are brave enough to be honest and fearlessly express their opinions regardless of the sneers and scoffs of the clergy. The inclosed article, "No Friend to the Infidel," demonstrates that the spirit that persecuted Galileo and Servetus still lives, but as they no longer dare plunge their daggers into the blood of innocent victims, they must needs content themselves by dipping their pen into the vile cesspool of slander. To show how Christians talk in Indiana, I inclose the following article from the Adams county Union:

"NO FRIEND TO THE INFIDEL.

"A fine thing to look upon is the full-fledged Infidel. He is a Freethinker; his thoughts are as free as the wind. He is the man who thinks it was a happen-so that he came into existence, and when he goes out it will be as the flame of a candle blown into darkness.

"What a cheering thought! He howls out his thoughts to whomever he chances to meet. Oh! for a little Puritanism to silence the mouth of every polluter in the land of churches and free schools who insist in hissing their contaminating fanaticisms into the ear of children; expressing opinion wherever they may chance to be. The gallows is too pure to be disgraced with them; fire would pale and go out at the first touch of the flames against their vile bodies; powder is too innocent to rend them. They should hav their miserable tongues torn from their throats and flung to the dogs. They are not fit to live in an intelligent community, for, like a contaminating plague, they poison the very atmosphere with their presence."

Yours, etc., W. J. ALLEN.

PERU, IND., Jan. 9, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I inclose the amount due you for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope you will get out of prison with your energy and zeal for the right not impaired in the least, and be able and willing to read that contemptible Comstock title clear for a hundred years to come. There are to-day five hundred men in the Indiana state prison who hav a better record for honesty and truthfulness than Comstock. The sooner such men as Comstock and his like are dead and in hell (if there is such a place) the better. He is a liar and perjurer, and a sneak thief is a gentleman compared to him. As he is now in the business of advertising female syringes, I should think he would let honest and decent people alone awhile at least. Friend Bennett, we want you out of that prison, a place you were pushed into by a corrupt court and a lying and bloodthirsty sneak by the name of Syringe Comstock. Yours,

M. LEW ENYART.

EUREKA, WIS., Jan. 7, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880. I hav thought all along that Comstock was the meanest man in America, but he has found his match in Abbot and Bundy. Comstock is instinctively orthodox in his very make-up, and when a man has it bad, it is useless to look for anything much better; but we do look for something better in men who profess to be Liberals. They are a beautiful trinity: Abbot the father, Bundy the son, and Comstock the un-holy ghost; and these three are one in spirit and purpose, which is to destroy THE TRUTH SEEKER and its worthy editor and proprietor. But they will not succeed if the Liberals of the country do half their duty. Yours truly,

E. B. ROUNDS.

HALIFAX, PA., Jan. 26, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having just recovered from a severe spell of sickness, I find a few leisure moments to drop you a few lines, which I ought to hav done long ago. Rest assured, my much esteemed old friend, that in thought and spirit I am with you every day. Since your cruel and unjust imprisonment, surely it never rains but it pours also, which was the case in the late outrageous attack upon your moral character, while they hold you in their merciless and relentless grasp. I can conceive of nothing that is sunk so low in the great economy of the universe as the human animal which is fully exemplified in Comstock, Abbot, Bundy & Co. These human hyenas know full well that in moral worth and intrinsic excellence of character they cannot approach you, hence their infernal howling. Enough of them. Thev are not worth the ink it takes to write their loathsome names.

I hav had large experience during my thirty years as a reformer. For many years I was active in the field as a magnetic and spiritual healer. I am personally acquainted with hundreds of prominent Spiritualists and Liberalists throughout the United States, and what I can gather, reduced down to a simple fact, is that one united voice, with few exceptions, that we hav not lost confidence in D. M. Bennett, that the silly letters he wrote while under the psychological influence of a crafty woman do not condemn him in our estimation, but the grand, noble, and heroic confession he has made, which needs only be carefully read to be accepted as a true statement of the whole matter, has raised him higher in our estimation than ever.

I am a little amused at some of the long-faced antics of my Spiritualistic brethren with whom I hav labored for many years in the same cause, and I feel the call again to go out and heal the sick. For instance, here is one from dear brother Peebles: Why do so many Spiritualists take THE TRUTH SEEKER in preference to Spiritualistic papers? I think that matter-of-fact Dr. Severance answered it to Dr. Peebles' satisfaction. If not, I will take a hand in the deal. Brother Peebles, we Spiritualists differ in our make-up. No two of us hav bumpology alike. Very few indeed like yourself. The most of us had to take the axe and shovel in hand to hew down the timber, dig the tunnels, and build the railroads for a few of you more favored ones in this grand cause to jump aboard and sail along with more ease. So if we find no fault with you, don't you find fault with us. We hav a strong hand in our deal. D. M. Bennett, with axe in hand, is ready and waiting for the expiring time of his cruel incarceration to strike heavy and terrific blows so that others may sail along easier. The fact is, brother Peebles, papers hav been too conservative. It was just time for Mind and Matter to be born. There is backbone enough there of the right stamp. I am a subscriber to the Banner, and hav read it from its first number. I also take Mind and Matter and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and intend to do so as long as I can pay for them. Now, friend Bennett, as soon as your new book is published I shall want a copy. Please accept my heartfelt sympathies for yourself and wife in this sore trial. Cheer up. I can see in the near future a golden harvest for you to reap.

Yours, CHAS. YEAKEL.

LONDON, CAN., Jan, 11, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Dec. 20th I notice the very able criticism by Elizur Wright of Prof. Goldwin Smith's alarm at the evident decay of supernatural religion, in his recent remarkable essay in the Atlantic Monthly. Both articles are well worthy of perusal by every thinking man and woman, whether Infidel or Christian; and whatever may be the conclusion as to to the beneficial or injurious results of the predicted collapse of Christianity, the unprejudiced reader must admit that the prediction itself is not unwarranted by existing facts.

I quite agree with the conclusions to be drawn from MR. Wright's article, that the approaching dissolution of superstition and Christianity is rather a matter for congratulation than alarm; and that the moral welfare of humanity will not be imperiled by the change. Morality is not at all dependent on the dogmas of Christianity, as history and present experience most abundantly prove, and the world will advance as rapidly without the religious incubus as with it.

The vast sums of money that are annually expended in forcing Christianity on the people will, during the "moral interregnum," be devoted to the advancement of education and science—to the establishment of Liberal governments and Liberal principles. Such are the legitimate causes of morality and truth; and well may we hope that the coming climax will bring not merely a "moral interregum," but a permanent moral reign which shall endure as long as earth is capable of sustaining human life, never again permitting superstition to occupy the throne. H. A. T.

MR. EDITOR: I think that I shall stand by your paper, let the wind blow which way it will. I think I can excuse the mistakes of a man who has done so much for the cause, so I inclose eight dollars, three for the paper, and five for "Supernatural Religion" in leather. May your paper survive the storm, and waft its sheets in the face of ignorance forever. So let us all lay our hate one side, and pull together and see what we can do.

Yours, J. P. WHIPPLE.

DETROIT, Jan. 10, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I desire to ask a question through your valuable paper: A secret organization asks a party to become a member. He sends in his application, and is accepted. On the night of initiation he is told he will be required to take an oath which will not conflict with his religious or political belief. He is then asked to take an oath on the Christian Bible, which he refuses to do; the degree is however conferred, and the party is solicited to ask for the second and third degree, which he does, and is balloted for and accepted. The next meeting night he is again asked to take an oath on the Bible which he refuses to do again, and the lodge refuse to confer the degree. The party then makes a formal demand for his money to be returned, but the lodge refuses to return only the money paid for the second degree, which the party refuses. Now what I wish to know is, has the lodge a right to demand a candidate to take an oath on the Bible? and has the lodge a right to retain the money paid them by the candidate, or must they return the money to the party whom the lodge refuses to confer the degree upon? Please answer this question and oblige,

Yours respectfully, H. JACOBSON.

See here, you T. C. L., who in TRUTH SEEKER, Jan. 3d, say to Abbot, "Go West, go West," if you hav any influence over A., I want you to stop that. We don't want him here. Send him East about four hundred miles, and let his millstone of sin carry him to the center of gravity, then I'll say, Amen. H. M. BISCHEL.

RENO, PA.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Our theological concern, a branch of the Methodist Episcopal persuasion of this place, has had a very sick spell. Although it had a change of doctors it grew worse and probably would hav collapsed had not assistance come from an unexpected source, which for a short time may hav the effect to assuage its grief.

There is in this vicinity a very wealthy oil company, at present employing about fifteen men. This company, or their superintendent, hav heretofore been donors to this Christian machine to a considerable extent, but of late this benevolent company has got an abundance of faith and lost all its charity and don't want to pay the Lord's bill any more, hence this sickness. But this same once charitable institution has again come to the rescue of this Mrs. Popinjay church by taxing each person in its employ to the amount of ten dollars with a penalty attached if not paid, to hav their wages reduced a certain amount immediately, these proceeds to apply to this Methodist Episcopal church of Reno.

This penalty had the desired effect on all except two bad Infidels, who had the courage to refuse payment, and were promptly cut down to three-fourth's time. This unjust tax fell upon other unbelievers, who paid by having the matter misrepresented to them. Over one-third of the taxed persons are heterodox in their belief, two of them subscribers to your valuable paper, and two of the Catholic persuasion. Most of the rest are members of this church. They (the Christians and members) paid their ten dollars with much rejoicing, and thanked the Lord for the glorious privilege of being allowed to pay his expenses, and one of them had the audacity to say it should be made compulsory to every person to pay to the Lord. But ask one of these same Christians to contribute one penny to the many poor that hav not the wherewith to sustain life, that are known to be in a starving condition, ask them to giv one penny, and they will thank the Father, worship the Son, bless the Ghost (the Christian three-card montes), and tell you they don't hav to. Such is Christianity. To him that hath the tin will we giv in abundance; he that hath not can go to the devil.

Had this thing of corruption gone to the wall in an honest manner, we might hav shed a tear for its misfortune, but as it is, we can only assist in the complete overthrow of this low, abject sham of immorality, and bring to his senses this small, diminutive, officious person who is willing to fatten himself on money extorted from Infidels and unbelievers in this manner. OBSERVER.

FARLEY, IOWA.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed please find $15 85. I hav the promise of more subscribers soon. I shall do all I can to increase the circulation of Liberal literature. My experience is that reading will do far more to free the mind from the fables of the past than all the talking that can be done, I wish that wherever there are a half-dozen Liberals they would form a library association and giv five or ten dollars each to a library fund and use it for the purchase of books and papers. Each could read five or ten times as many books as he paid for, which would be a great benefit to thousands of Liberals, for I tell you we are mostly poor people who work for our bread. The Radicals are generally poor. The Conservatives are generally those who are rich and well-fixed. Again, if these books were allowed to circulate, free to all who would read, Freethinkers and Liberals would be more plenty, in a very short time. In order to get this move started some publishing house must offer such inducements to these people as will them into an association or organization. I believe that if the Liberals of the country were informed that they could get books at a fair per cent off by forming these associations, many would spring up all over the land. There is a disposition on the part of men to associate themselves together in order to purchase below retail price, and many will thus purchase who otherwise would not; I know this is the case with our association. If we had been compelled to pay retail price for books we would not hav one where we now hav five. I ask you to think this matter over, and hope you will start the machinery to moving. I may be over sanguine, but it seems to me that the move would be a good one. If it increased the reading of Liberal books it certainly would increase the demand for Liberal periodicals.

With my regards to Mr. and Mrs. Bennett and yourself, I am truly yours to the end of the war, H. GILMORE.

How Much It Has Cost the Church.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: All my ancestors were Presbyterians of the "true blue" stamp. My mother and father were Presbyterians; and to the days of their death their faith in the creed of the church never wavered. I am now an old man. I was born a Presbyterian, educated at Presbyterian schools, know all the creed, the practices, the ins and the outs of every church that is honored by the significant title of "evangelical." I hav been connected with several Presbyterian churches, with a number of Congregational churches, Dutch Reformed and Methodist churches, having held responsible offices in them for many years, so that I know I understand thoroughly, and hav a correct appreciation of all the sentiments, the movements, both aggressive and defensive, the hopes and fears, successes and apprehensions of the entire ecclesiastical fraternity; and I hav been strikingly impressed, for many years, with this fact, that the Christian church is losing ground, losing influence, losing support, losing the confidence of sensible citizens, and losing numbers all over the United States. Sensible people who are not kept in priestly ignorance and subordination are constantly impressed with the fact that the supporters of the churches are a priest-ridden class of most ignorant zealots; and all over the country the supporters of the churches are casting off the sacerdotal yoke on account of the priestly tyranny, bigotry, and oppression, and are beginning to do their own thinking.

The leaders of the churches see this; they know it; they pray over it; they preach about it; they write about it; and they heave sighs and groans and lamentations enough to make the kingdom of Satan tremble, on account of the great decline of interest in the church and the unprecedented falling off in numbers during the past year.

It is not denied by all sensible people, whether ignorant or learned, in the church, that the recent damaging arrest of D. M. Bennett, the damaging mock-trial, the damaging conviction, the damaging incarceration, the most damaging refusal of the President to extend a pardon to Bennett for such a venial offense, has damaged the interests and future welfare of the church beyond all computation; and the leading and most active participants in that damaging farce groan and sigh, and weep and mourn, over the heart-rending desolations all about the church, which will never be repaired, even after they hav been sleeping in the dust for ages upon ages. No mortal man will ever be able to compute, in dollars and cents, how much Bennett's unchristian trial and his heathenish incarceration hav cost and will for the future cost the Christian church. Bennett's trial, incarceration, and recent unwarranted attacks by the leaders of the church upon the good order, the harmony, the comfort and domestic happiness, and commercial usefulness of law-abiding, peace-loving, and strife-hating citizens of this, nominally, Christian commonwealth, together with the damaging influences incident to the many recent disgraceful, and revengeful ecclesiastical quarrels, hav already, cost the church thousands of honest, faithful, and intelligent supporters; and it is acknowledged by all—yes, all—the greatest leaders of the ecclesiastical fraternity that if the falling off in numbers should continue for ten successive years according to the ratio of the last two years, the Christian churches will be represented by barely numbers of sufficient magnitude to maintain their respective organizations. One of the leading divines of Brooklyn recently rendered his official report to the Presbytery, in which he wails and howls over the lamentable falling off from 53,000 to 75,000 during one single year!

Let that 20,000 of "slide-backers" be called up and required to render a reason why they hav thus apostatized in such a damaging manner to the churches they were pledged to love and cherish, and the reply, to a man (or woman), will be: "We hav become heart-sick, disgusted, tired, grieved, provoked, and angered at the unchristian and unwarranted course pursued by nominal Christian authorities." Sensible people perceive in the relentless disposition and hostile animosities of the leaders of the churches at the present day, the same spirit of cruel persecution that applied the thumbscrews, the torturing rack, the blazing fagots, the red-hot gridirons, and other instruments of hellish torture, to innocent victims because they refused to obey the unjust behests of bigoted and deceitful priests during the prevalence of the ancient historic persecution. Yet these bigoted, obstinate, revengeful, illiberal, and blind leaders of a blinder priesthood and a still more blind people, will persist in "going it blindly" with blind impetuosity, at any and all costs of money and numbers of supporters, so long as they can maintain their supremacy and wreak their damaging and relentless vengeance on some innocent and inoffensive citizen who dares to cherish a single thought that does not coincide with the creed of an overbearing priesthood. Again, I repeat that the damaging incarceration of friend Bennett (because he dared to cherish an opinion that did not coincide with the priestly creed), has cost and will cost more damage than all the praying and preaching, Bible-reading and missionary work, can repair during half a century. S. E. T.

A Universal Psalm.

BY ANNIE D'FRIESE.

The glorious sun of Reason is rising clear and bright,
The mist of superstition dispelling with its light;
The dark and gloomy curtain of creed we tear away—
How lovely is the landscape, how perfect looks the day!
Our world among the millions that glide in ether space,
Guided by Law, with progress keeps steady onward pace,
'Tis not "a house of mourning," nor "valley of dry bones,"
But 'tis a world of beauty which loving Nature owns.
Praise, then, great mother Nature! who suckles man and beast,
Sing all ye lands, in her embrace, South, North, the West, and East!
Sing to the golden glory of day's great god and king,
Sing to the royal queen of night, and make the welkin ring!
Sing to the stars, that strewest the sky with golden flowers,
Sing to the winds and waters, and this fair earth of ours,
Sing to the evening's splendor of crimson and of gold,
To purple twilight tender, black night, dawn, grey and cold.
Sing to the hills that lifteth their immemorial crowns,
And to the storm-clouds hanging above with threat'ning frowns,
Sing to the glens, and valleys, and to their grassy meads,
Sing to the little brooklets, and to their bending reeds.
Sing to the bright-winged dragon-fly, that darts athwart the stream,
Sing to the shining mote, that swims a gem in the sunbeam,
Sing to the trees, whose shadows stretch grateful to the kine,
Sing to the wayside hedges, wild rose, and eglantine,
Sing to the turf, that springeth soft to the weary foot,
Sing to the moss, that clingeth about the old oak's root,
Sing to the soil, the witness that testifies of time,
ing to the rock, that standeth a monument sublime,
Sing to the summer solstice, to spring's sweet new desire,
To winter's purifying frost, and to the cleansing fire,
Sing to the fruitful autumn, fair queen of all the year,
Sing to that Law, that whirls our world and rounds our smallest tear,
Sing to the minds of Science, who do this Law rehearse,
Sing, sing, to Man! the sovereign of all the universe!

Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

Christ and Christianity.

This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read.

ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $2.00.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser, What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.50.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

BY

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

We are in a sad world, full of pain, but we hav to make the best of it. Stubborn patience and hard work are the sole remedies, or rather the sole means of temporary escape.—Stephen.

"WELL, my boy, the best augury of a man's success in his profession is that he thinks it the finest in the world. But I fancy it is so with most work when a man goes into it with a will. Burritt, the blacksmith, said to me the other day that his ''prentice had no mind to his trade: and yet, sir,' said Burritt, 'what would a young fellow hav if he does not like the blacksmithing?'"—George Eliot.

BUT now the Lord's ain trumpet touts,
Till a' the hills are roarin',
An' echoes back return the shouts,
Black Russel is na sparin.
His piercing words, like Highland swords,
Divide the joints and marrow.
His talk o' hell, where devils dwell,
Our vera souls "does harrow,"
Wi' fright that day.—Burns.

AT length, after long ages of experience in the social state, the idea of not doing to another what he would not hav done to himself became seated in the fibers of man's brain, and was transmitted by heredity, so that now the essence of all morality and all law may be summed up in a precept of eight words, and can be taught without express revelation or a burdensome priesthood, to wit: "Be just and kind to all sensitive beings."—Hon. E. P. Hurlbut.

FEAR is the very essence of superstition, and superstition the chain by which the priest secures the people to himself; hence, in all ages, the constant re-echoing of the words, "Ye cannot be saved." Except ye be under the pope, ye cannot be saved; except ye believe the Athanasian creed, ye cannot be saved; except ye believe that the first sin of the first man utterly corrupted human nature, ye cannot be saved; except ye believe in predestination and important righteousness, ye cannot be saved—J. Blanco White.

THERE is no miracle in the production of life' Were all life now to be destroyed, organic life would just as surely appear on earth again, under the same circumstances of heat, light, and other materials, as it did before. You can dissolve or separate the component parts of water or air, and reunite them again. Butter can be made from hay or corn by chemical means as well as by these materials passing through the secretive organs of a cow. Only hav the conditions right and the result is sure to follow. Life-germs (as germs) do not exist till produced by the forces of the parent; but life is an inherent quality of matter, and has no beginning or end. Whether the egg or the chicken was first has never been decided, because both are developments and neither had a perfect existence as a beginning.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE predominant culture of modern times had its origin, more than eight hundred years ago, in the superstition of the middle ages. A mystical reverence was attached to the sacred number seven, which was supposed to be a key to the order of the universe. That there were seven cardinal virtues, seven deadly sins, seven sacraments, seven days in the week, seven metals, seven planets, and seven apertures in a man's head, was believed to afford sufficient reason for making the course of Liberal study consist of seven arts and occupy seven years. Following another fancy about the relation of three to four, in a certain geometrical figure, these seven arts were divided into ten groups. The first three—Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric—comprised what was called the Trivium, and the remaining four—Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, and Music (the latter as a branch of Arithmetic)—formed the Quadrivium. This scheme has been handed down from age to age, and, with but slight changes, still predominates in the higher institutions of learning, and still powerfully reacts upon the inferior schools.—Prof. E. L. Youmans.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petition is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibiy directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this esson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1.50.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas, Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

Issues of the Age.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that it should "assist" also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address and the famous articles of Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson

ON PRAYER.

With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist, Prof.

H. HELMHOLTZ.

Paper, 12mo, 105pp., 25 cts.; cloth, heavy, tinted paper, 50 cts. Inaugural and portrait only, 12mo, paper, 69pp., 10 cts.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

SUPERSTITION;

THE RELIGION OF

"BELIEVE OR BE DAMNED."

OPEN LETTER TO THE

ST. JOHNS SCHOOL BOARD.

BY M. BABCOCK.

SUPERSTITION OF TO-DAY AND THE DARK, DARK SUPERSTITION OF THE PAST.

This book contains an inspired photograph of the God that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools; the God that overshadowed Mary: the God that's wanted in the Constitution by the gentleman who owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. This picture is worth the price of the book, 25 cents; five for $1.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Herald Irish Relief Fund reaches nearly three hundred thousand dollars.

THE trial of the eleven persons charged with attempting to bribe the Pennsylvania Legislature has commenced.

DR. SAMUEL HAHN, a deceased member of Adler's Society, has been cremated at LeMoyne's crematory, Washington.

COWLEY, the convicted child-starver, though in prison, is still a minister in good standing in the Methodist Episcopal church.

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK would be a nicer sort of man if he dispiayed a little more modesty of demeanor in the courts of justice.—Star.

THE Second Annual National Liberal Encampment will be held at Bismarck Grove, Kansas, from September 1st to the 7th inclusive.

"O LORD, I haven't asked anything of you for fifteen years, and if you'll get me ashore I won't ask anything of you for fifteen more," was the sailor's prayer in a storm.

CHINAMEN in great numbers are leaving California and coming East. Many of them are settling in the various towns along the railroad and quite a number are reaching this city.

A HUSBAND whose wife had joined the ranks of the crazy religious enthusiast, Mrs. Girling, in the south of England, stormed the camp last month, and after a fierce contest of fifty minutes carried off the truant vi et armis.

MR. JOHN FARNSWORTH, of Fort Scott, who represented Kansas on the Executive Committee of the Liberal League of America, has resigned. The American Liberal Union has no membership now in Kansas, and not much anywhere else.

THE Irish College of Cardinals has sent £450 to the pope as Peter's Pence. If the suffering Irish are to be wheedled out of their money by a college of cardinals, what is the use of America sending over two or three hundred thousand dollars to relieve them? It could be put to better use here.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY is to found an unsectarian "divinity" school, which greatly discomposes the Central Baptist, which does not believe in giving Baptist money to turn out possible Freethinkers. It says: "Genuine Baptists, and for that matter we may add genuine Christians of every name, hav but little use for so-called unsectarian things. A creedless religion is a godless religion."

A CITIZEN of Sedan, Kansas, having disappeared from that place, the local paper said it is a good riddance, because "he was an enemy of honesty, disloyal to his friends, no respecter of old age, a traitor to manhood, a slanderer of his benefactors, the terror of good men, and a fit companion for the fallen angels." Somehow that description reminds us of a Boston editor; but then we do not suppose he ever lived in Kansas.

THE Daily Witness died of scantiness of breath and capital on Saturday, March 6th, aged eight years and a few days. It passed away in the full faith of an hereafter and the continued belief that Christian promises go much further than Christian fulfilments. The good the deceased did at one cent a day can never be gauged by worldly standards. Enough to say, that it was a glory to faith, and a mighty bad newspaper.—Truth.

THE town of Sharon, between New Ipswich and Peterborough, New Hampshire, with a population of 900 inhabitants, has no church, no tavern, no lawyer, doctor, or minister within its borders; and what is a natural consequence of its peculiar state of society, there is not a pauper in town. The humble schoolhouse diffuses intelligence, and good farms well tilled promote prosperity among the inhabitants of this rural retreat.

JOSEPH COOK stated in one of his lectures that "Moncure D. Conway writes from England that marriage is fit only for common people." Mr. Conway writes to the editor of the Independent: "I hav vainly searched the report for any explanation of this extraordinary misrepresentation. I beg leave to say in your columns that it would be impossible for the brain of man to devise or for pen to write a sentiment more abhorrent to my ethical and social opinions than that which Mr. Cook has ascribed to me."

REV. A. T. PIERSON, a Detroit clergyman, who recently attacked the stage, saying, among other things, that "the green-room of the theater is often no better than the infamous third circle that, in some theaters, opens directly into the house of shame," is sharply taken to task by Mr. Stuart Robson, who writes to the Free Press: "I challenge Rev. Pierson to name a single state prison which numbers among its inmates an actor, and I will contribute $100 to the Irish famine fund if he can name a single state prison that does not hold a preacher."

"IT will interest the friends of phonetic spelling," says the Paris correspondent of the London Times, "to know that efforts are being commenced in the direction of reform by several German publications, including the Kolnische Zeitung, which has dropped among other superfluous letters, the unnecesary s in the termination of niss, the h in such words as Theil, Noth, Muth, and their compounds, the h in the terminal thum, the unnecessary a in Waare, and so on. The above-mentioned syllables now appear in the chief German papers spelt thus: Teil, Rat, Not, Mut, Tum, Ware."

D. M. BENNETT, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has notified the President that he withdraws from before him the petition of 200,000 citizens of the republic praying for a pardon for him, and informs him that he does not seek a pardon at his hands. We admire the resolution and pluck of Mr. Bennett. Were we in his place we would sooner rot in prison than to accept a pardon from such a religious bigot as R. B. Hayes. If that class of intolerant bigots were in the majority in this country, persecution for opinion's sake would be revived, the fagot relighted and flame again with all its ancient horrors.—Cloud Co. Blade.

IT seems that, though it only takes $93.04½ for the City Mission and Tract Society to convert a soul, it takes the American Missionary Association $110,45. This is a providential discrimination in favor of the City Mission Society which we do not quite understand, unless it be that a Congregationalist is seventeen dollars harder to convert than an Episcopalian. Still, on the whole, it is satisfactory to know that the gates of heaven may be opened at so reasonable a figure. The Presbyterians, on the other hand, deny that it can be done so reasonably, and this introduces a painful doubt as to the efficacy of the conversions guaranteed genuine by the other two sects. On this ground it would, perhaps, be better to save the money and take the chances.

HENRY WARD BEECHER is again to the front. In a recent sermon he says: The crying evil of our time is lying and dishonesty. There is need of a stand in the churches upon this matter of taxation in Brooklyn. There is an essential spirit of dishonesty in this matter. Men resort to all manner of duplicity and still wear the profession of religion to escape paying their share for the support of government and the institutions of society. I believe taxes should be shared alike. There should be taxes on churches and on ministers—on everything but the state institutions. Why should not my salary be taxed just the same as that of a bank president? Men say churches should not be taxed because they are for the good of morals. So are all regulated institutions, including the family. There is great need of witnesses in our churches for honesty in accounting for property and honesty in the payment of taxes. Men are sneaks in this matter. Some who are worth millions pay only for mills. Rich men get into churches and smear over their dishonesty with a varnish of religion.

MR. JOHNSON, pastor of the East and West Granville (Mass.) Congregational church, has been ousted for general irregularities. The members of his congregation say he was a "most awful liar," and never returned borrowed money. Added to these was the heinous crime of riding what his people called a "bicircuss," and taking twenty-five-mile walks for no "airthly good." When the flock locked the church he broke into it and practiced as of yore; but when they stopped his salary he stopped preaching and sued them. If the salaries of all the ministers were stopped how quick we should see them haul off and let the devil work his own sweet will!

"THE clergy's reward—an epistle," is what the San Francisco Argonaut calls the following: "'In all your gettings, get money.' Now, therefore, when you go forth on your ministerial journey, go where there are silver and gold, and where each man will pay according to his measure. For verily I say, you must get your reward. Go you not forth as those that hav been sent, 'without two coats, without gold or silver or brass in their purses; without scrip for their journeys, or shoes, or staves;' but go you forth in the good things of this world. And you shall hear of a church that is vacant, and has no one to preach therein, then be that a call to you, and be you mindful of the call, and take you charge of the flock thereof, and of the fleece thereof, even of the golden fleece. And when you shall hav fleeced your flock, and shall know of another call, and if the flock be greater, or rather if the fleece be greater, then greater be also to you the call. Then shall you leave your old flock, and of the new flock shall you take the charge. Those that hav 'freely received' let them 'freely giv,' and let not men hav your words 'without money nor without price,' but bargain you for hundreds and bargain for thousands, even for thousands of silver and gold shall you bargain. And over and above the price for which you hav sold your service take you also gifts, and be you mindful to refuse none, saying, 'Lo, I hav enough!' but receive gifts from them that go in chariots, and from them that feed flocks, and from them that earn their morsel by the sweat of their brow. Yes, take you gifts from all, and take them in gold and silver, and in bread, in wine, and in oil, in raiment, and in fine linen. And the more that the people giv you the more will they honor you; for they shall believe that 'in giving to you they are giving to the Lord;' for behold their sight shall be taken from them, and they shall be blind as bats, and 'shall know not what they do.' And you shall wax richer and richer, and grow greater and greater, and you shall be lifted up in your own sight, and exalted in the eyes of the multitude, and lucre shall be no longer filthy in your sight. And verily you shall hav your reward."

ABBOT says that the resolutions passed at Cincinnati call for the free transmission through the mails of all immoral books, and adds: "All these were concocted in cowardice, hypocrisy, and fraud, without moral courage to make a thoroughly honest and open avowal of the yet evident purpose of the series as a whole. They were a disgrace to those who drafted them, and are a disgrace to all who defend them." Abbot knows very well that Col. Robert G. Ingersoll drafted those resolutions, and he makes the charge against him of being in favor of obscene publications, besides being a coward, hypocrite, and fraud. Joe Cook once made the same charge, and this is the Colonel's reply; it will fit Abbot very closely by just changing the name: "Joseph Cook says I am in favor of obscene literature. When Mr. Cook said that he wrote the word 'liar' square across his forehead; and every man who repeats it is a liar, and no man on earth dare say it to my face. Such men are sneaks and beneath my contempt. If the truth was red-hot they would never be scorched. I am in favor of the literature of science having the same right as the literature of superstition. I am against the mailing of any book that would bring a blush of shame to the cheek of womanhood or manhood, and persons charging me with it are miscreants and liars. I am against some of the literature of the Bible, although I may be damned for it. I will giv $100 in gold to any orthodox clergyman who will read to his congregation next Sunday certain chapters that I will point out to him from the Old Testament. If any should read it, every pure woman would leave the house, and the men would only stay to administer punishment for the insult to their wives and daughters. The cause of obscenity in the Bible is that it was written in a rude and barbarous age. There are passages in Shakspere that are rude and filthy, and the reason is that Shakspere did not rise above his times when writing his works. But God can't get off on the plea that he is four thousand years behind the age. If there is a God, he never uttered a word to bring a drop of modest blood to the cheek of a young and innocent girl. Men who try to blacken my reputation are not fit to blacken my boots."

Eighth Letter from Albany.

MY DEAR READERS: The month of February has passed, windy March has made a good beginning, and I cheerfully embrace the opportunity allowed me, once in four weeks, to hold communion with you. My health continues fair, and my spirits as good, perhaps, as could be expected under the disagreeable circumstances. The days and nights, the weeks and months, seem long to me, and as they drag themselves slowly away, I have abundance of time for meditation. My thoughts are not always as pleasant as might be desired. My mind not unfrequently reverts to the wrongs that man has perpetrated against his brother man in the centuries that have passed away. With Cowper, I often mentally exclaim, "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." This has been effected by wars, tyranny, oppression, slavery, and intolerance of many kinds. Not the least, by any means, has been the oppression brought upon man because he desired and dared to exercise freedom of opinion upon religious subjects. Unnumbered thousands in all these centuries that have preceded us have suffered cruel torture and death because they would not and could not believe in matters of religion as the tyrants commanded. The agonies, the anguish, the suffering of mind and body that have cursed the earth from the determination of cruel oppressors to crush freedom of thought could not be described in thousands of volumes.

We boast of our civilization; we exult at the great strides the race has taken in nearing the goal of freedom and equal rights; we point to the wrongs that have been cast aside in making this progress; we extol the superior and heavenly system of religion which prevails in our land—a religion based on love to God, love to man, and equal rights for all; yet with all these claims, late in this nineteenth century, and in this "free land of America," there is a determination on the part of the leaders in this boasted system of religion to oppress those who presume to differ from them in opinion about that religion. This is a saddening reflection, and it many times passes through my mind as I lie here in my prison house and the hours of night wearily take themselves along. It is one of the most desirable things in our existence that every man should enjoy the freedom of his own belief on all subjects and the liberty to express the same to all who choose to hear.

We, as human beings, are so constituted that we cannot think alike on all subjects, or, in fact, upon any subject. In religious belief there must always be a diversity of opinion. It is easy for the masses to subscribe to the doctrine of supernaturalism—that the universe is governed by a mysterious, personal, special Providence, who not only plans and executes the billions of events that daily transpire, from the revolutions of worlds to the falling of a sparrow, but marks out, as well, the course and career of every individual of the one billion four hundred million of men and women who inhabit this moderate-sized globe, to say nothing of the countless decillions of living beings who may exist on other worlds millions of miles away. On the other hand, there are hundreds of thousands who cannot take this view of the situation. They recognize the universe as being governed by inherent laws and causes which produce every result that takes place, whether of large or small magnitude; that there is no part of the boundless universe dependent upon the will or superintendence of any person or being. The first class imagines that the sun cannot rise in the morning and pursue its course through the day; that the earth cannot rotate on its axis; that the rivers cannot descend from the mountains to the sea; that the winds cannot blow over the surface of the earth; that vegetation cannot put forth and perfect itself, and that all the other operations of nature cannot be performed save by the direct supervision and aid of a divine mind or will. The other class believes all these operations take place regularly and without confusion simply in obedience to the eternal laws of the universe. The one class think the universe is unable to run of itself and must have a supernatural director every instant. The other class is certain there is not and cannot be any such thing as supernaturalism; that the universe and its forces perform everything that is done, and all perfectly natural.

Yes, the masses in all the countries on the globe believe in gods of every conceivable description, by whose individual powers the universe was made and is kept in motion, while the smaller class believes that the universe is a "perpetual motion" that cannot stop, cannot stand still, and that a million gods, did they exist, could neither stop it nor set it a-going. The one class are sure that the gods do everything, and the other that they do nothing and that there is nothing for them to do. One believes in hells and devils to torture men and women, the other cannot. So in all the ramifications of religious thought, they think; differently, and ever must. And why should they not? If one class requires more evidence to arrive at an opinion than another class, are they to blame for it? Can an intelligent person believe whatever he is commanded he must believe, nolens volens? And shall he be beheaded or burnt or thrown into prison beaause he cannot believe what he cannot believe? Oh, no. In the name of all that is just and true and righteous, a thousand times no. Let every man have the right to go wherever his convictions lead him; let him enjoy the right to investigate every subject under the light of the sun, and let him have the freedom to hold and speak his belief. I am sure I am willing to accord this privilege to every human being, and I would that every other human being felt the same willingness towards every man and woman. I would not coerce another man to think as I do, and I wish no man to try to coerce me. Yes, let liberty of opinion on all subjects be the universal concession made to every living person.

From this standpoint, my friends, you cannot think it strange that I often realize the hardships to which I am subjected for simply selling and depositing in the mails the opinions of an honest, sincere man on a subject most important to the race, the same opinions being couched in language as proper and unexceptionable as any physiological work treating upon similar subjects. But I need not dwell upon this point. You understand it well, and you know I only performed an act that every American citizen has a right to perform; you know the injustice that has been done me and that the charge upon which I am here was the merest pretext.

Excuse me, my friends, for detaining you with these sad reflections. We can undoubtedly find a pleasanter theme. Let me relate to you a vision or a remarkable dream I have had. Do not laugh. Why have not I the same right to have a vision as any other man? Should not being shut out from the world, including the society of women, for these many months, living on a spare diet of two meals a day, with my animal spirits in a continual state of depression, have a tendency to make me heavenly-minded? Even if naturally obtuse, and of the earth earthy, should not this severe course of training elevate my ethereal nature? Should I not, by this time, be able to see a vision or a ghost? Possibly having my mind occupied in writing up a history of the old gods and religions has awakened the divine afflatus in me, and brought me en rapport with the spirit-world. This, however, I can say, What I have seen I have seen; and if I have not had a vision or a dream—a dreamy vision or a visionary dream—I don't know what to term it. Whether I was in the body or out of the body, whether in my head or out of my head, whether in a normal condition or in an abnormal state, whether asleep or awake, I will not undertake to say. But on a recent night, as I lay upon my bed, when the still, weird, witching small hours had come, and the moon was calmly shining in the outer world, I had been meditating on many things that have an existence as well as some that have not—and if I was not asleep I ought to have been—when a tall, dim, shadowy figure noiselessly approached my bedside. I noticed that one side of his face was lighter than the other, that he had small wings on his hat and others on his feet. Among the parcels he held in his hand was a rod, with wings also attached to it, and with serpents twining around it. He was a stranger to me, but I gave him a slight nod as he drew near, as much as to say, "How do you do, sir?" He nodded in return and spoke thus:

"Bennett, how do you do? I perceive you don't know me."

I replied: "I thank you; I am not so as to be out, but wish I was. You are indeed a stranger to me, but nevertheless you are welcome."

"I am," said he, "Hermes, or Mercury, formerly of Egypt, but later more known in Greece and Rome."

I was taken by surprise, but not frightened. I made an attempt to rise and give him my hand, but by a motion from him I retained my recumbent position, and said: "Indeed! Is this the god Mercury?"

"Yes," answered he, smiling; "they called me so, but I don't feel much like a god any more."

I was somewhat lost in wonderment why he called upon me, and thus spoke: "I remember, Mercury, it used to be one of your offices to attend the dying and accompany their souls to the nether regions. Tell me, is that the object of your visit to me?"

"Oh, no," he replied, "you are not going to die yet awhile. I have called to have a chat with you on a matter of business."

"Oh, thank you! I feel very much honored, I assure you. I have read of you, and am glad to make your acquaintance. May I inquire after your health and general condition?"

"Oh, my health is about as usual. I never complain much, but am not the person I used to be. I feel a little thin and weak."

"And how is your father, Jove, the old thunderer? I hope he is well."

"I have to inform you the old gentleman is not at all well. He has been very feeble for nearly two thousand years. He does not thunder so much as he did."

"Without being impertinent I wish to inquire if he is ever gay and frolicsome any more, like he used to be? Does he have any more love ventures with the goddesses and other ladies?"

"Oh, no; he quit all that long ago. He don't think of those things any more."

"Well, he drove a pretty lively business for several centuries, and mankind regarded him as a very amorous old fellow. May I inquire after your sister—as some authors have it—Venus? She was not without fault, but the world has nevertheless admired her greatly. I hope she is well?"

"I thank you, she is tolerably well, and is better preserved than some of her companions. Her natural vivacity of character, and the affection of mortals for her, have tended to this result. But she has changed very much, and has become staid and serious. Her old friends would hardly know her."

"Pardon me, Mercury, but if Venus was your sister, was it not an unnatural liaison you had with her, of which Hermaphroditus was the result?"

"Oh, don't mention that. We both would like it forgotten. It was a mistake not uncommon to some of the gods. We are not doing that way any more."

"Your biographers give you the name of being very 'light-fingered,' and say that you commenced thieving very young. Are those accounts true? and if so, were you ever imprisoned therefor in a place of this kind?"

"You must not believe half what you read about the gods. A great many misrepresentations and exaggerations are made about them. I was, however, naturally thievish, but was always too adroit to get into prison."

"I never heard of one beginning so young at stealing. It is said that on the very day you were born you stole cattle from King Admetus and arrows from Apollo; and that soon after you 'played hob' with old Vulcan by stealing his blacksmith tools. It is not strange you have been called the 'prince of thieves.'"

"Your remarks are severe, but probably just. I confess I acted out my nature with but little restraint. But I have greatly reformed."

"There is also much good said of you. You are called the god of merchants; you distinguished yourself as a peacemaker, and as an errand boy or messenger you probably have not been excelled."

"You but do me simple justice. I was a friend to merchants, but they have become so sharp they require my services no more. I did delight in making peace among contestants, and as a messenger I distinguished myself, as you say. But business in that line is dull now. Since railroads, post-offices, telegraphs, and telephones are so generally in use I am not as much needed as twenty-five hundred years ago."

"I presume you are correct. But I must say that was a very sharp game you played upon the hundred-eyed Argus when your old father sent you to rescue the beautiful Io from the watchful monster. Your music must have been very charming to have put all his eyes to sleep at once, and enable you to cut his head off. I presume you did your best."

"Yes, I left no effort untried. I was making my reputation then, and I did the best I could. I rather flattered myself upon my success on that occasion."

"Let me inquire after jolly Bacchus. Is he as fond of his cups as ever?"

"Well, perhaps the old tastes linger around him somewhat yet, but the fires of youth are dull with him. He has become very steady, and his habits of abstemiousness would make him a good president for a temperance society."

"How is honest old Vulcan? Is he still carrying on the blacksmith business, making thunderbolts, etc.?"

"Well, Vulcan is much like 'Uncle Ned.' He is old and feeble, and 'cannot work no more,' and sometimes he also wants to be 'carried back.' His shop is in ruins; his bellows, his forge, and even his anvil are decayed, and he has not forged a thunderbolt for two thousand years. They are gotten up now by another process. Jupiter don't use any more, and the business is not worth a cent."

"Why, Mercury, it is rather a gloomy account you give of the heavenly heroes of former times. How is it with the rest of them?"

"Well, the same remarks will apply correctly to all. They are old, feeble, very quiet, and, in modern parlance, pretty well 'played out.'"

"Tell me more about yourself. You seem to be pretty well preserved. What are you giving your attention to?"

"Activity was one of my characteristics. I always liked to have something on hand. When business on Olympus collapsed, I looked around among all the other gods, and whenever they had any errands for me to do, or any messages to deliver, for a slight consideration, I have been glad to attend to them. But you will be surprised to learn how very dull it is with all of them, and how lifeless and feeble they all are. Why, within the last ten days I had the greatest time you ever heard of getting all the gods together, in general convention. I thought at one time I would not be able to accomplish it, but I had undertaken it, and I was very unwilling to meet with a failure. We have not had such a time before for a thousand years at least."

"Pray tell me what it was all about, and why was the convention held?"

"Why, bless you, it was in reference to yourself. You need not think it is only in this country that you attract some attention. You have also agitated us considerably up stairs, or some of us at all events."

"Indeed, you surprise me. What have I done that the gods should be disturbed? Please tell me about it."

"It is that book you are working upon. I have had my eye upon you for the last two months. It is my line of business you know. Literature, language, and letters are under my supervision, and as I discovered you were writing a book about us gods I watched you closely and reported my observations all around where my business or leisure invited me. I mentioned it to Jahveh, one day and told him what you had written about him, and he fired up in a minute, and he spoke out in an angry manner that a stop must be put to all this. He requested me to call and see him next day."

"You allude to Jehovah, I presume, when you say Jahveh?"

"Yes, Jahveh or Jah is his right name; Jehovah is a corruption by translators. The first letter, J, has the sound of Y; the final letter, h, is silent, so, properly, the name is spoken as though written Yahvy. That is what we generally call him."

"I remember you are credited with being the inventor of letters, and you must understand the proper sound of them, as well as being posted in orthography. I do not doubt you are quite correct, as I have seen similar statements by other philologists; but tell me more about your convention of the gods."

"Well, I called the next day upon Jehovah, and he was still very much excited at what he termed your presumption and insolence, and said he wanted to stop your book or stop you. He said he had been thinking the matter over, and concluding he could not carry out his wishes without some assistance, he had devised the plan of getting all the brotherhood of gods together and enlisting their attention and interest with regard to this outrage."

"'Now, Mercury,' said he, 'if you will undertake to see all the old gods of all the ancient nations—you know many of them are much older than myself—and get them stirred up in this matter so we can have a big convention and stop this book, if we are successful, I will make it all right with you for your trouble.' I replied that I had not much business on hand, and would undertake the enterprise. I had never seen all the old fellows together, and thought it would be interesting to have something new, in the way of holding a big meeting. He cautioned me not to use his name too freely in the matter, but to represent that Brahma, Ormuzd, Baal, Chemosh, Osiris, and others were interested in the matter. He remarked, by way of explanation, that a great deal of ill-feeling had existed towards him from unfriendly remarks he had made about them centuries ago. I told him to leave that to me, and that I would undertake to get them all together in ten days from that date. But I have had such a time of it as you never heard of. They reside great distances apart, and the journeys I have had to make are almost innumerable. Besides, I found the dullest, stupidest set of deities you ever imagined. I found many in a profound sleep, and numbers nearly lifeless. I dont't believe some of them had been wide awake for a thousand years. I had to shake them up with my utmost effort to get some of them aroused at all. They wanted to know what I came there to disturb them for. They did not wish their long sleep broken into. I told them an alarming story about the book you were getting up in this lower world, telling all about all the old gods that men have worshiped, the religions that grew therefrom, and that there was a strong feeling that steps must be taken at once to put a stop to it all. Some of them told me to go away; that they cared no longer what men thought of them or said of them. The reputation of the gods was at stake and it must be preserved at all hazards. 'Let Bennett go ahead,' said they, 'and let me finish my nap.' But I stuck to them until I got them awake and made them promise they would attend the convention on the 30th of February. And to make sure of it I called a second time and aroused them again and made them swear they would surely be on hand on the day appointed."

"Mercury, you interest me beyond expression," said I. "Where was the convention held?"

"In Asgard. Jahveh spoke first about having it on Mount Zion or on Sinai, but he feared those localities would arouse the prejudices of the other gods, which he was anxious not to do. Mount Morus, Mounts Olympus and Helicon, were named, but I told him they were very much dilapidated and out of repair, and that we could find a better place. I suggested Asgard, of the Scandinavians, as being later fitted up than many other dwelling-places for gods, that I saw it a few months ago, and thought it would do very well. Besides Odin, the chief god who presided there, was not particularly objectionable to the other gods; whereupon it was agreed that Asgard should be the place for the convention. But I must say the place is more dilapidated than I thought it was, and being open and cheerless we were rather cold and uncomfortable."

"I will be delighted to hear about the proceedings," said I.

"That is just my business here. I come to tell you all about it. Two o'clock P.M. sharp was the hour named, and I am happy to say that the most of the old fellows were very prompt. Only a dozen or so were fifteen minutes late. It mattered but little, however, as half an hour was agreeably spent in hand-shaking and renewing acquaintances. The excitement and the exercise of getting there had made them more lively on an average than I had supposed possible. Some of them presented a faint semblance of their former selves.

"It would have done you good to see them flocking in from all directions, and in all conceivable modes of travel. Some came in chariots, some on wings, some by sail, some by steam, some by electricity, some by imagination, and some by will power. Only a few came on foot, whose residences were comparatively near. They came in national groups, or in companies somewhat in the order of their creation or birth. Thus the old Vedic gods, Indra, Varuna, Agni Soma, Mitra, Maruts, in company with Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and Juggernaut; and their wives or goddesses with them in all cases, to wit, Lacshmi, wife of Vishnu; Parvati, Kali, and other wives of Siva; also Rama, Christna, and scores of minor deities, Asscoras, etc., too numerous to mention; all these came from India.

"From China they were not so numerous. Chang-ti or Tien, Fo, or Fohi, and several others, however, made a novel appearance with their long queues.

"From Persia we had Ormuzd, Ahriman, Mithra, and several others of less note.

"The delegation from Egypt was numerous, the principal of whom were Amun, Neph, Pthah, Khem, Ra, Seb, Osiris, Typhon, Horus, Serapis, Thoth, Anubis, Anouke, Apis, and many others, with numerous goddesses, as Sati, Neith, Maut, Isis, Nephtys, etc., etc. They made a large concourse.

"Chaldea sent Baal, Ishtar, Astarte, Il or Rah; Ana, Anata, Bil, Bel or Enu, Beltis, Hea or Hoa, Dav-king, Sin or Huski; Sau, or Sansi; Ai, or Gula; Vul, or Iva; Bar; Nin, or Ninaip; Bel-Merodock, etc., etc., making in all a large troupe of male and female divinities.

"The Assyrian delegation was full—Asshur, Merodoch, Nebo, Beltis or Mylitta, Gula, and many others.

"All the Semitic races were represented; prominently by Ashera, Bel, Moloch, Chemosh, Allah, and others in full suite.

"From the land of Canaan, or Judea, the number was limited to Jahveh, Holy Ghost (very thin and shadowy), the Son, and Mother, with Satan slightly in the rear.

"From Greece and Rome the number was large, with old Jove at their head, then Saturn, Neptune, Pluto, Mars, Apollo, Helios or Sol, Bacchus, your humble servant, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Latona, Aurora, Vesta, Cybele, Ceres, Janus, Vulcan, Æolus, Momus, Pan, Silvanus, Diana Pales, Flora, Feronia, Pomona, Hercules, Theseus, Prometheus, Æsculapius, and more than two hundred others, including the muses, nymphs, dryads, naiads, fauns, satyrs, genii, tritons, penates, lares, manes, heroes, etc., etc.

"From Scandinavia and the Norseland the turn-out was good. Odin and Frigg, Hermod, Tyr, Heimdal, Brage and Indun; Thor, Sif, and Uller; Balder and Nanna; Vale and Forsette; Vidar, Mimer, Njord, Skade, Æger, Ran, Frey, Freyja, Loke; and all the rest of them, including the jotuns, giants, dwarfs, elves, hulders, trolls, nisses, necks, etc., etc.

"The Gauls and Druids were represented by Hu, or Huah; Ceridwen, his wife, Llywy, or Creirwy, and others whose names are too hard to pronounce.

"From Africa came a numerous delegation of black gods and goddesses, but you don't care about their names.

"Polynesia sent Taaroa, Tii, and all the host of them. The Aztec gods were plentiful, prominent among whom were the bloody Huitzilopotchli, the merciful Quetzalcoatl, and the good goddess Cioacoatl.

"Manco Capac and his wife, Mama Ocollo, of Peru, with numerous companions, were there. Many gods and manitous of the North American savage tribes were on hand. All these, besides the gods of other nations too numerous and too tedious to enumerate, helped to form our big convention. There were two thousand of them at least, and such a looking lot of gods I never saw before. They were of all sizes, shapes, and colors, some very large and some very small; some very dark and some very light, and some copper colored; some very thick and some extremely thin, so thin and shadowy, indeed, that they could scarcely be discerned even by their best friends. Yes, they were a motely lot; but I took it upon myself to act as usher and furnish them with seats according to their standing or position in the celestial regions, each nationality by themselves as far as possible. It kept me occupied for some time, with Apollo and Mithra to help me.

"At 2.30 Jahveh called the convention to order and nominated Indra as Chairman or President. The motion was seconded and carried by a full vote, no opposition being made. The same party nominated Chang-ti of China, Brahma of India, and Osiris of Egypt, as Vice-Presidents. It was a mere matter of form, and they were declared elected, and all took seats on the platform. Nebo of Assyria and myself were made secretaries, and I was requested to take full notes. Indra was very feeble, and looked extremely ancient. He made a brief speech thanking the convention for the honor conferred upon him; and while he did not understand what was the object of the meeting he hoped a spirit of harmony would prevail in the deliberations. 'You are well aware,' said he, 'that I am one of the oldest deities among you all, and it is quite time I went to my last repose. In fact, I was sleeping soundly when I was aroused and notified to attend this convention. You know as well as I can tell you that the most of us obtained our existence and worship as personifications of the elements and forces of nature, and that we hav drawn our life from the belief of our worshipers. Those who hav a living and acting constituency retain the most life and activity. But since nature has got so she needs no personal representative, and since for thousands of years the adoration once bestowed upon me has nearly passed away, I find my life is nearly exhausted, and I hardly desire to exist any longer. Those of you who have living worshipers may feel different on this point from myself. May I ask what is the business before the convention?'"

"I am pleased," said Mercury, "that you enjoy what I have to say, for it renders my task far more pleasant. To resume, I will say Jahveh immediately arose to his feet and said, as he probably was as well posted with regard to the object of this meeting as any one present, he would detain them a few minutes with a word of explanation. He continued thus: 'As our venerable friend, Indra, truly observed, we, as gods, obtained our life and our very existence from the beings in the earthly world who worship us. In their fertile imaginations we find our life and activity, and without it I fear we should all cut but a sorry figure among men. I am fortunate in having much of this sort of life, and I don't wish it interfered with. Let me inform you, then, my compeers, that this is being done. There is a man on the planet called earth who is at this very time writing a book of all the gods that have been widely worshiped in the world; and he proposes to publish and sell as many copies of the work as he can. I got this information first from my friend Mercury, and since then I have sent two spies or detectives to look further into the matter; and I have to state to you that Mercury told the truth. This man, whose name is Bennett, is making a big book, giving more information about us all, what our characteristics are, what people have believed about us, and what religious notions have grown out of all this, than was ever incorporated in one book. And more than that, he does not speak respectfully of us all, and makes statements damaging to some of us, which I confess annoys me not a little. I wish something to be done to arrest this business before it goes farther. I hope you will realize the importance of taking immediate action in the matter.'

"At this time, and before Jahveh had concluded, Brahma arose in a grave, dignified manner, and said he had a few words only he wished to say. 'I am surprised,' said he, 'that we should be summoned here from our slumbers on such a subject as this. It is a matter of very little consequence what this man who has been named chooses to write about us. The same thing has been done for hundreds of years. I see no impropriety in it, and I am far from being disturbed by any such thing. It is small business in us to be disturbed on any such account.'

"He took his seat, and Jahveh immediately rejoined:

"'I must say I am sorry to see any of you so indifferent upon such a subject as this. Our moral character is of the greatest importance to us, and for one I have maintained too spotless a reputation for three thousand years to have it sullied now by an inhabitant of the lower world, and I most decidedly protest against it.'

"He then took his seat, having a very earnest look upon his face.

"Ormuzd here arose, and, though extremely feeble, he made himself heard by those near him. He said he wished to make the inquiry of those who had the information to impart whether the man referred to had used misrepresentation and slander in what he had said about the gods. Jahveh replied immediately that he did not charge the man with falsehood, but with telling too much truth. 'You all know,' said he, 'that the truth is sometimes more damaging than falsehood, and should not be spoken on all occasions. There are some truths that I think should not be allowed to be spoken or to get out. There are some things connected with the history of each one of us that we would prefer not to be perpetuated among men. I must admit what this man has said of me, and the charges, if they may be so called, have been taken from what is called my own "book," or "word;" but that is what makes it annoy me so much. The fairness of the presentation makes it all the more telling against me.'

"At this point Ormuzd resumed thus: 'I am well convinced,' said he, 'that we are all much in the same situation. We were all brought into existence by the fertile imaginations and zeal of our particular worshipers, and were subject to the conditions which governed us. We were crude, cruel, amorous, bloodthirsty, and warlike, just in proportion to the characters and tastes of those who worshiped us; and this truth cannot be successfully denied. Perhaps in my own case I have as little to complain of as any of you. There have been made no heinous charges against me, and, upon the whole, a pretty good record stands in my favor. This is not because of anything special that I performed, but is due entirely to the people who worshiped me, and who, after all, did what was done. I see no objections to truthful accounts being written of all these things. It is due to the inhabitants of the lower world that they have in their possession the whole truths pertaining to us and to the religions which our worshipers maintained in the times that are passed. And as it appears the man you speak of has not falsified the record—has not invented falsehoods, has only procured information from the sources open to him, and merely stated the facts which have been given before—I am in favor of not interfering with him. His work is a legitimate one, and my vote is in favor of letting him go ahead.'

"'These remarks," continued Mercury, "made a perceptible impression upon those who were within the reach of his feeble voice, and Jahveh himself seemed to feel the truth and force of them. At this point Moloch, of the Ammonites, arose. He looked very aged, and a stern aspect rested upon his countenance; but his extreme feebleness was very apparent. He spoke thus: 'I am impressed with the justness of the remarks our friend Ormuzd has made. Perhaps I have a record for cruelty standing against me as undesirable as any one among you. I am, as you know, one of the old fire-gods who were so devoutly believed in and worshiped four thousand years ago, and my brother Chemosh, of Moas, whom I see sitting over there, is another, and Baal, not far from him, is another. Many of you were of the same class. Fire, you know, was an emblem of the sun, and the worship of fire grew out of sun-worship. The sun being the source of light and heat, was very naturally regarded as especially worthy of reverence, and nothing in the semi-barbarous age in which we flourished was more easy than to get up personal deities to represent the sun. You will remember that many nations did this. Many of you had your origin more or less in connection with this sun-worship. I have been stigmatized as a most cruel god, much as my friend over there from Mexico has been, as well as others, not necessary to allude to. Human beings were sacrificed to us in great numbers. I will not deny but what infants were often sacrificed to me and burnt to death in the most cruel manner in the sight and presence of their own parents and hundreds of people. But when we remember the low stage of civilization and advancement of man at that time, it is not, perhaps, to be wondered at. Our worshipers, at least, were sincere. If the principle of sacrificing life of any kind to the gods is correct, and if it is true that the more perfect and valuable the animal, the more acceptable and efficacious the offering, human sacrifice is but the natural result and climax of that idea. It was not our fault. If fault there was of any one's, it was on the part of our worshipers and designers, and they can hardly be blamed for it. They acted in accordance with such light and intelligence as they had, and are therefore excusable. That they were sincere, as I said, cannot be doubted. The great regret is that they had not a higher grade of civilization. These facts are a part of the history and evolution of the human race, and I can see no reason in trying to hide them. Let the man get out his book. If it is truthful it can do no harm. Chemosh partially rose to his feet, and said he fully subscribed to the remarks just made. Baal, of Babylon, Assyria, Phœnicia, etc., said a few words in the same direction. Hutzilopotchli, the bloody war-god of ancient Mexico, and some of his Aztec compeers, signified their acquiescence also with what had been said. They considered human sacrifices one of the phases of religious superstition in a cruder condition of society, and was much to be deplored.

"At this juncture an amusing little episode took place. Mumbo-Jumbo, of Africa, jumped up suddenly, and was considerably excited. His remarks were as follows: 'I want to let you all understand that I am on the side of Massa Jahveh. He has got the right of it. We gods have a right to do just whatever we please, and it's none of that man Bennett's business. I don't believe in his being allowed to write up all about our little mistakes and cruelties. What if we have been cruel? What if we have caused thousands of human beings to be put to death? It's none of his business. I don't want him writing in a book what I used to do, or for him to poke any of his fun at me ither. I tell you, I join with Massa Jahveh. I say let all his writing about us gods and all our religions be squashed out without any parleying about it.' A smile was at this time seen on the face of several of the gods at these earnest remarks, but no special reply was made to them. It was noticed that Jahveh manifested a slight lack of appreciation of the support he was receiving and of the quarter whence it came.

"The next noted speaker was old Jove himself, and I must say I was sorry that my father was so feeble and infirm, so unlike what he was three thousand years ago. He has not the majesty and noble bearing he had then, but still he compared favorably with many of his godly compeers. His words were in this wise: 'My celestial brothers, the object of our meeting is not of as much consequence as I was led to suppose when my son Mercury notified me that a convention was to be held. I am so feeble that I felt disinclined to come, but he urged me to be present by all means, as matters of consequence were to be deliberated upon. I indulged a hope that some plan was to be devised by which we could regain the power and life which unfortunately we hav lost, and to establish us again as of yore in the adoration and affections of mankind, but this is undoubtedly a hopeless case. We are among the "have beens," that have had an imaginary existence, and our day has passed entirely by. We have all been local gods. None of us have had a world-wide reputation. The two small countries of Greece and Italy were all that took much stock in myself or believed strongly in my existence. It has been the same with the rest of you. We were, even in our palmiest days, merely local, national, or neighborhood gods. The domains of some of us did not extend over ten thousand square miles, while the best of us could not claim a dominion of more than two or three hundred thousand square miles. The gentleman from the hills of Judea, generally called Palestine, who has spoken so courteously to us, for a long time had authority over a very circumscribed part of the world. The length of his entire kingdom, for a thousand years, was but one hundred and forty miles, with an average width of less than forty miles. That was a pretty small country for a big god, who would hav the world believe that he made the whole earth and all the other worlds that exist. Why, the least of us had more territory to rule over than he had, and we did not make as much fuss about it either. He has had the good fortune to be adopted by many modern nations, otherwise he would scarcely have been recognized among men. I have often noticed his disposition to lord it over the rest of us, and to assume an air of superiority which he does not possess. If his character is compared critically with that of some of the rest of you assembled, it will suffer severely by it. I don't want any hard or unfriendly words on this occasion, but if there was time, and I felt inclined, I could name hundreds of instances where his acts would compare very unfavorably with those of many who are present. As for myself, I lay no claim to superior virtue or extra goodness. I was a rollicking sort of fellow in my halcyon days, and did not believe in denying myself the pleasures within my reach. Probably I sowed more wild oats than was advantageous to my credit as a god, but I am sure my heart was all right; and I did not overflow with anger, malice, and vengeance. I wished my subjects to be happy, and to obtain all the pleasure from existence possible. There is one thing which in justice to myself I wish to say: There have been many things narrated of me which are not true. Homer, the poet, was upon the whole a good friend of mine, but he drew upon his imagination very largely, and made me more of a rake than I was. This has been the case with all the rest of you, my brother gods; there has been a great deal said of you that never took place. On this score I feel much charity towards my somewhat distinguished compeer from Palestine. There has been much said of him that belongs wholly to the domain of myth and fable. But in closing, let me remark, whether what has been said of each of us is true, or whether it is false, I will not at any time shrink from a comparison with him, and let the record of the career of each be the criterion to go by. I say not this in anger or pettishness, but in truth and soberness. So far as the book is concerned which that man is writing, I have no objection to it whatever. The history of the gods is the property of man, and I would not deprive him of it. The story has already been repeated over and over again, and I have no objection to its still being given in a new form.'

"This speech," remarked Mercury, "made a visible effect on the listeners. It was evident a considerable of a majority of the vast assemblage were in sentiment with the speaker. The next one who arose was Osiris, of Egypt. He said:

"'I have but little to add to what has been said, and but little needs to be added. I am one of the older ones among you, though there are some, even from my own nation, still older than myself. I have long, long been very feeble, and was not able to come out to-day; but I cannot say I am sorry I am here. There is a satisfaction in looking upon all your faces once more. There are features of similarity between us all. Alike we are creations of the same kinds of power—the power of human imagination. Alike we have been invested, by our worshipers, with supreme and creative ability; alike it has been believed of us that we each and severally formed the suns and worlds that are in existence, and that we, by our immediate and constant supervision, have kept them in operation for thousands of years. We all know, and thousands of sensible human beings have learned, that this was a most erroneous belief, and that it had its rise in the ignorance of mankind. We all now know that the universe is far older than any of us—that it existed countless ages before one of us was conceived in the mind of man, and that it was controlled by unerring and unchangeable laws, inherent within itself, as entirely independent of any of us and of all of us as of the tiniest animalcule that exists in it. Whether man relegates the government of the universe to one god or divides it up among a thousand gods, it is all the same erroneous. The universe is infinitely more powerful than any god and more than all gods combined. It requires not their aid in any way, and regards their dictation no more than it would the discussions among mice or gnats. A few thousand years ago it was believed by rather intelligent men that the sun could not rise in the morning and pursue its course through the day unless some of us forced it to go, and kept this force constantly applied. What an absurdity this was we all know; and vast numbers of men are learning the same. We now know that there is not a single movement or operation in the entire universe that requires the attention or help of any person or individuality whatever. All those mistaken notions have wholly fallen to the ground, so far as we are concerned, and, as I said, in the opinion of many sensible human beings.'

"'Yes, many of us here present, in the ages that are past, have been honestly believed by thousands of millions of men to be really the creators of the boundless universe, with its millions of suns, worlds, and systems, and which extends into space forever and forever—thousands of times farther than any of us have traveled. We now know how very absurd this belief was on the part of those ignorant people, and how much more erroneous it was for them to suppose that the illimitable universe could have been created from nihility by any god, any individual being, or person, than to accept the great truth that it is itself, without beginning or end, without center or circumference, boundless in extent, limitless in duration, and, though constantly evolving and changing in its details, still infinite in space, infinite in age, infinite in material, and infinite in power—the only existence that is omnipresent, the only one that is omniscient or omnipotent. I repeat, we all know this perfectly well, that the universe is the source of all existence, whether individualized by organization or not. It is the creator of all beings; and not all the beings combined that ever had an existence, including all of us gods, and millions of times as many more, with all the power they might be supposed to possess, could, with all their combined energy and will, bring from nothingness even the smallest globe that swings in space to-day. You all know this perfectly well, and can realize just as well as I do how greatly mistaken men have been in the credit they have wrongfully accorded to each and every one of us.

"'There are yet, however, my friends, large numbers who are not able to take a correct view of this great question; but it is to be hoped this ignorance and error will not always prevail among men. Let me here express the opinion that the belief in gods among men has been of the greatest disadvantage to them imaginable. It has led them into innumerable errors, and has been the center and foundation of all the false mythological and theological errors, all the mistaken creeds, that have prevailed in the world for more than fifty centuries. If man could have realized the great truth that the universe requires no maker, no designer, no superintendent, no propeller, and that his first duty was to inform himself, so far as possible, in regard to its laws and operations, vastly better would it have been for him, and much farther would he now be advanced on his journey toward the great temple of truth. It would have saved him thousands of years of allegiance to mythical gods and devils; it would have spared him the great expense of maintaining an innumerable horde of priests and prophets who have pretended to know and declare the will and purposes of the gods, when they knew no more about them than an infant three days old. It would also have saved them from the indescribable terrors of devils and demons, of hells and places of torment, which have agonized the minds of wretched human beings for these many thousands of years. As to the matter of the story of our rise and rule, our mistakes and peccadilloes, I have not any objection to its being told again and again. There are lessons in it that may be valuable to the world, and I say, Let the truth always be made known.'

"When Osiris took his seat the nod of approval of what he had said passed through the convention. Many seemed to take pleasure in manifesting their approbation of what they had heard from the venerable and highly-respected god of ancient Egypt. Vishnu of India was sitting in the front row, and I perceived that several looked at him intently, and indicated by slight gestures that they wished to hear a few words from him. He soon rose and gave utterance to these words:

"'My companions, you see by my venerable locks, and you know by the story which has been related of me for thousands of years, that I am among the older members of your fraternity. I have been much mixed up with the affairs of men for several millenniums. Millions upon millions of devout worshipers have bowed in reverence to me. Millions upon millions of sacrifices of animals and other offerings have been made to me; but let me here confess to you that I now know this has all been built up on the most stupendous errors the mind of man is capable of conceiving. I am still in a fair state of preservation compared with many whom I perceive here. My worship has continued a long time, and a hundred and fifty millions of living human beings still regard me with profound reverence, and this, as you are aware, imparts to me the comparative vigor which I exhibit. I have been regarded as a beneficient god. My hands are not stained with innocent blood. I have delighted in making my subjects happy. Nine times, it is believed by my admirers, have I been incarnated in human, or other forms, for the purpose of serving the gods or aiding in the salvation of man. The tenth avatar or incarnation is, in their view, still to take place; but it will never occur. They are deeply in error in that, as well as in all that pertains to the legends connected with me. All is wrong, all is error and delusion. And I now thoroughly realize how much better it would have been for my people could they have been followers of truth instead of being the dupes of all these errors. My worshipers accorded to me a kindly disposition, and many peculiar personal characteristics; but I am constrained to confess to you that all these have grown out of the mistakes and errors I have alluded to; and I regret them most sincerely. I would much prefer to have never had an existence of any kind than to be indebted for it to such sources. Much better that the name of Vishnu had never been known than that it should owe its existence to errors and fallacies of deluded human beings. As to the book on the gods and religions of ancient times, I am in favor of it. I approve of it thoroughly. Let the people of earth be as fully informed upon these questions as it is possible for them to be. Good will come out of it The more men can know of the errors of the past the better they can avoid the errors of the present, and the better can they shun the errors of the future. I will detain you no longer.'

"As soon as Vishnu had completed these remarks, Allah of Arabia stepped up to him, and taking him by the hand shook it heartily, saying, in a gentle voice: 'I congratulate you, my elder brother, for the grand sentiments you have expressed. They are mine exactly, and your uttering them so nobly has spared me the necessity of making any remarks. With you, I wish all mankind had the truth as it is in nature, instead of being led from century to century by such baseless vagaries as they are now led by. I heartily wish my own worshipers were followers of the truth, but unfortunately I can do nothing to aid them. My brother, I thank you.' Upon this several others stepped up and shook Vishnu by the hand, and among the number several goddesses. Some spoke a few words of approval, and others only smiled a hearty acquiescence. The next regular speaker was Chang-ti of China. My notes of what he said read thus:

"'My brother gods, none of you can boast of an antiquity greater than my own. It is many thousands of years ago that my countrymen gave me birth and worshiped me, and since then large numbers of them have continued to revere my name. I have been a modest sort of god; my nation are a modest sort of people. They attributed to me beneficence, goodness, wisdom, and supreme power. They thought me the creator of the great universe, and that but for my powerful arm it would immediately relapse into chaos again, and that everything in nature would go to destruction. But sadly indeed were they mistaken. Their ignorance greatly surpassed their knowledge. They saw the universe existing in all its majesty and perfection, and in their childish and untutored minds supposed it must all have been created by a personal but powerless god like myself. As I said, none of you are older than myself. I may be properly styled one of the very oldest of the gods; but I assure you that the grand universe is millions of ages older than I am. As old as I am my age is much less than that of the race of man on the earth, and compared with the age of the universe the age of man is less than a second in duration. How untruthful it is then for my people, or the people of any of you, to give us the credit of creating this great universe! My conscience often has condemned me for this undeserved honor being conferred upon me. I have never created a universe, neither have any of you created a universe. The belief that we have any of us done this impossible thing is one of the greatest fallacies that that ever entered the mind of superstitious man. This idea, like an ignis fatuus, has led him a weary chase for these many thousands of years. I regret this as much as any of you possibly can, and only wish it were in my power to remedy this evil; but it seems as much beyond my power to do this as to create a universe. The human race must look to science and the enlightenment of the understanding to dispel the numerous errors that have so long fettered them and bound them in chains of darkness. Candor compels me to say that I fail to see the danger which my comparatively young brother of Palestine seems to apprehend from enlightening mankind upon the gods and religions which have been embraced in past ages. I cannot perceive the slightest harm that can grow out of it; but, on the other hand, it will add to the stock of knowledge which the world needs, and must be productive of good. My voice shall be in favor of the dissemination of truth and knowledge. I have nothing further to say.'

"This speech was also well received, and nods of approval were to be seen on all sides. There was a delay of nearly a minute, as no one seemed anxious to be heard. At this, the chairman, Indra, called upon Odin, of Scandinavia, the principal god, who with the other gods of the Norsemen had often met in this locality. Indra asked him if he would not favor the convention with a few words. Odin is a weather-beaten-looking god, with a rough exterior, but he has an honest face and a hardy-looking countenance. He rose in a modest, unassuming manner and spoke thus:

"'My brothers in the realm of myth, I have wished to welcome you to Asgard, where myself and my old Norse compeers have so often met in the gay spirit of hilarity and fraternity. I regret it is not in our power to render you more comfortable here, and that Indun has not a lot of her apples to regale you with, that your age and vigor might be renewed. But the fact is, since the decadence of our power, and since our life has so greatly died out, the old place has gone to decay, and ruin and desolation are too manifest all around us. I am afraid there is little hope of the place ever being refitted, as our occupation is gone and there is no longer anything for us to do. My sturdy, rough, but honest worshipers once regarded me as the creator of this world and all other worlds, the same as the worshipers of many of you have accorded the same credit to you. But, alas! how mistaken they were! None of us have any more effect upon the great machinery of the universe than a fly would have in affecting the revolution of the earth. I have long since become sick of the fulsome praise which for centuries was bestowed upon me, and I indulge the hope, which many of you have expressed, that light and intelligence may take the place of the fallacies and darkness which have so long occupoid the mind of man. I coincide with the sentiments which have been expressed here, and have no objections to interpose against the publishing of all the legends about the gods and religions of the world in the past ages that are obtainable. The more mankind understand these things, the better. As the reign of the gods is nearly over let us hope that the reign of humanity may be far more prolonged and successful. Before I take my seat I wish to propound a simple question to our brother, formerly of Palestine, and that is, why he deemed it important to call us together because he, personally, had objections against a certain book being published? As the writer of that book resides in a country over which he, Jahveh, reigns, and if the god possesses the power which he and his representatives claim he does possess, I wish to inquire of him why he does not himself dispose of this offending mortal without calling us together to assist him in so small an enterprise. If the man is annoying him, why don't he remove him from the stage of action and say nothing about it?'

"Cries of, 'Hear!' 'Hear!' resounded from all parts of the assembly when this inquiry was made, and all eyes were turned towards Jahveh, who exhibited unmistakable annoyance at the turn the deliberations had taken. He rose in a somewhat impetuous manner and glancing scornfully around spoke as follows:

"'I am indignant that you do not enter into my reasonable views, and feel very much as I used to in old times when my anger waxed hot and my vengeance was aroused. What I wanted and what I said is fair and correct; and the reason why you all oppose me is because you are heathens. You are only worshiped by pagan nations, while I am the god of enlightened Christian nations, who far excel in intelligence, religious views, and moral conduct all the other nations of the globe. I feel proud of my constituency, and can justly claim a superiority over all of you. I am the only regular, orthodox, highly respectable god among you. My character is unsullied, and my morals unimpeachable. I have a larger following than any of you, and have more living worshipers than any one among you all, and hence have more power and life. I wish you to understand that I consider myself head and shoulders above you all, and that I have not done myself great credit in meeting you in convention. But in answer to the question that has been propounded to me I will simply reply that my object in calling you here was because I wished to secure your aid and co-operation in what I hoped to accomplish. Several of you have simply expressed the truth of the situation when you say that as a class, gods have not the power which was formerly accorded to them. They are not so omnipotent as was once supposed. We have all learned that the universe runs without our aid; the sun rises and sets, the rivers and streams run down hill, just as they have done from the earliest times, before we were dreamed of, and they do not require the help of any of us to continue the same. I understand all this just as well as any of you, but I don't think it good policy to let it be generally understood. The more we can keep the idea extant in the minds of men that every operation of nature is dependent upon our good will, and upon our constant supervision, the more power and veneration we may expect from them. You know how it is yourselves just as well as I can tell you, that human beings are born and live and die in keeping with the laws of nature, and none of you, singly or combined, have any necessity for interfering in the matter, nor would the effect be apparent if you did. The same remarks are applicable to myself. The gods have not given life and taken life, as men in their ignorance have supposed. Nature accomplishes very much that gods have had the credit for. But in this case under consideration I hoped that a combined action on the part of all of us might be much more effective than either could be by himself. You were all once considered very powerful. Jove with his thunderbolts, Thor with his mighty hammer, Mars with his war chariot and spear, Vulcan with mighty muscles, and all of you with the arms and strength which men have endowed you with, it would seem, if united in one purpose, ought to be able to accomplish almost anything. But I see how it is; you do not enter into my wishes in the matter, and if you did your power is gone. I will no longer insist upon a combined effort until you are more in favor of it. Possibly it may be desirable to confer together once more. For the present I have little more to say.'

"Upon finishing these words the god of the Jews took his seat, with an expression of displeasure resting upon his countenance. Several of the gods showed a purpose to rise and reply to him, but Buddha, being younger and more active than the others, gained the floor first and was recognized by the chairman. His words were to this effect:

"'Mr. Chairman: I did not think of detaining you with any remarks of my own, but I feel a desire to reply to some of the statements and insinuations of the last speaker. Of course I am not a full-fledged god by birth, having a mortal woman for mother, but I was believed to be begotten by divine agency, no man having anything to do in the matter. So by birth I rank as a demi-god, and for more than two thousand years, under the name of Fo and other appellations, I have been worshiped by vast numbers of the human race. At this moment four hundred millions of the inhabitants of the earth are devout worshipers of mine, more, undoubtedly, than either of you have had at any time since you were gods. I estimate that within the last two thousand years I have received the sincere homage of fully ten billions of human beings, not far from ten times the entire present population of the earth. Which of you can show such a record as mine? I have twice the number of living worshipers that any of you ever had, and in the past nearly ten times as many as any of you have had, with, perhaps, the exception of Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and Chang ti. They have had more than one-tenth the number of worshipers that I have. This constitutes me, my hearers, a living and powerful god. This is what imparts to me the vigor I possess, and perhaps accords to me the right to be heard on this occasion. I say not these words in a spirit of boastfulness, but in the spirit of truth. I have never been given to boasting or bragging of my unequaled power or the superiority of my conduct and morals, but I cannot say the same for all who are here. There are some who have continually boasted of their powers, their ability, and of the many mighty deeds they have done and can do. I do not want to be personal in my remarks, but I think they will apply with considerable justice to our aristocratic friend, the god of the Jews. And the remarks he has just made justify my making some allusion to them and pointing out their incorrectness. I think he claims too much for himself. May I ask wherein his superiority consists? It certainly is not in age. Some of you are far more than a thousand years older than he. The greatest he can justly claim is thirty-eight hundred years, never having been heard of before that time, while some of you go back five thousand years. His superiority certainly does not consist in the extent of his original possessions or the number of his former worshipers. A territory, as my friend Jove remarked, less than a hundred and forty miles in length and not forty miles wide on an average, with that pretty well filled with mountains, ravines, and precipitous places, and incapable of sustaining more than one or two millions of people, the worship of all of whom he could not truthfully claim at any time, does not seem to be a sufficient basis for a great amount of boasting or claims of superiority over all competitors. Had it not been for the support his son has brought to him, and the extent thus given to his worship by the spread of Christianity, he would assuredly have been one of the most obscure gods here. This is the only thing that has built up his reputation.

"'I do not wish to speak disparagingly of his power, nor to make it appear less than it is. It is not my disposition to undervalue any god, even though he may be arrogant and overbearing, but I would like to ask what remarkable exhibition he ever made of his power, since he confesses that the forces of nature perform all the operations of the universe? When he concluded to establish his power and build up a constituency some thirty-eight hundred years ago, he made profuse and repeated promises to one Abraham as to the country he should give him and his seed to possess forever. He promised that the seed of Abraham should possess the country from the river Nile to the great river Euphrates, and that his seed for multitude should be like the sands of the sea, the stars of heaven, and the dust of the earth. How were these promises fulfilled? Did the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob ever possess all the territory from the river Nile to the river Euphrates? No, not the fiftieth part of it. Five hundred years after the promise was made they robbed and murdered the rightful owners of a small country (one hundred and forty miles by forty), and thus obtained possession of it. Did they even hold that small section of country forever? No, they were disputing and fighting over the ownership of it. They had not peaceable possession of it for even one thousand years, and during that time they were twice subdued by the heathen nations; they were carried into captivity, and their country taken possession of by their conquerors. For several centuries the country had a very unsettled government of incompetent chieftains, and during the reigns of its kings there were but two that could pass as even respectable, and the first part of one of those was spent in brigandage, robbery, and despoiling his neighbors. After the second reign they quarreled and divided among themselves, spending their time in war and bloodshed against each other, until they were finally subdued and routed by other nations.

"'One thousand years is a rather short "forever" for a first-class god. Let me ask again, Were those descendants of Abraham equal in number to the dust of the earth, the stars of heaven, and the sands of the sea, which, in the aggregate, must amount to countless decillions in number? No, nor anything like it. The population of Judea never amounted to more than two millions of people, and they were not all Jews; and now that they are scattered all over the earth in nearly every nation, after nearly two thousand years to recuperate in, they are estimated in all at four or five millions. Thus it seems those extravagant promises were never made good. What are we to suppose to be the cause of these failures? It must be one of four things: the power was not in proportion to the undertaking, or the god was not sincere when he made the promises, and did not intend to fulfil them; or he changed his mind after he begun; or the story is wholly an untruthful one. Every one can decide for himself which the real cause is. I incline to believe both the first and the last to be correct.

"'How is it about his superior virtue and morality? Is he more kind, sympathetic, and merciful than other gods? Has any one taken more life than he? Did not the deluge—claimed to have been caused by him—destroy an inconceivable amount of human, animal, and vegetable life? Was not the drowning of the hosts of Egypt in the Red Sea another wholesale destruction? Was not the massacre of the Midianites, men, women, and children, save thirty-two thousand virgins, who were kept for the use of the soldiers and priests, a most cruel and bloody slaughter? Were not the many years of bloody war against the Canaanites a continued work of carnage? Was not the instant slaying of fifty thousand and seventy men, because one or two of them raised the lid of an old box, rather a summary and unmerciful proceeding? Did it indicate a benevolent disposition for Jahveh to send Saul with two hundred and ten thousand footmen to go and smite the Amalekites and utterly destroy all they had—men, women, infants, sucklings, sheep, camels, and asses? Was it clemency in the god that made him get angry at Saul for saving some of the best of the sheep and oxen for sacrifice? Was it a just reason for deposing Saul from the throne? Was it merciful in the prophet Samuel to hew King Agag to pieces before his god? Was it a good specimen of divine justice for Jahveh to slay with pestilence seventy thousand innocent persons because he had moved King David to number the people? Was it not rather a bloody day's work when this same Jahveh helped Abijah, king of Judah, and his army to put to death by the sword five hundred thousand of his own people, the children of Israel, serving under Jeroboam? Is it to be supposed that he made some amends for this slaughter by afterwards turning the tables and helping Israel, under Pekah, to slay one hundred and twenty thousand of the men of Judah? Was not also his compassing the death of one hundred thousand Syrians in one day, and, when those not killed fled to Aphek, putting twenty-seven thousand more to death, a pretty large destruction of human life? Was not the slaying of one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians, on another occasion, by the hand of one of his angels in one night, another instance of taking human life on a large scale? If these accounts are to be taken as true, I would like to know where there is another god who has taken life in such a wholesale way?

"'It is not my purpose to particularize all the characteristics which he has evinced, which the most of us would consider not as high proofs of morality and probity? He has often been governed by anger and vengeance; often punished the innocent in place of the guilty; often shown fickleness and changeableness by repenting of what he had done; often shown cruelty to women, children, and the oppressed; often instructed his children, prophets, etc., to practice falsehood, deception, and to take property to which they had no right; often made the most bloody and immoral men his special favorites; he has acknowledged himself the creator of evil, and has shown an immense fondness for the blood and flesh of animals sacrificed to him. For a long time he required that almost every day lambs or bullocks should be put to death for his pleasure; and at the time his temple was dedicated to him, it is said twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep were sacrificed for his benefit. Considering the small size of his domain at that time, I am sure none of you, ye gods of sacrifice, can excel that destruction of life.

"'I will not detain you to review all his acts nor to bring his career critically to notice, but will just remark that his boast about his being the only regular orthodox, moral, and highly respectable god in this assembly, in view of all that is recorded to his disadvantage, comes in rather bad taste and is not sustained by the record. I did not wish to draw comparisons between him and myself, but will say that while he calls himself the orthodox god and ranks me of course among the pagans, I will not shrink from a comparison with him on the score of mercy, justice, and morality. I can say, in truth, that during my career—and it has been nearly as long as his own—I ever inculcated the highest morals with which I was acquainted. I enjoined upon my followers the subjection of the animal passions, the virtue of self-denial, and the strictest honesty. I encouraged, to the extent of my ability, purity of life and the strictest self-circumspection. I constantly taught the great excellence of love, kindness, and benevolence. I ever commanded the utmost carefulness towards all grades of animal life, even down to the minutest insects. I never caused men to kill each other or injure each other, but ever strove to prevent their doing so. I never wished animal sacrifices of any kind made to me, and my worshipers have never practiced it. I extended sympathy and kindness to women and infants. My children have not engaged in war with each other; and in point of kind conduct from man to man, abstinence from crime and excesses of all kinds, I am ready any day to compare them with the worshipers of the god of the Jews. Still he vaunts himself as the orthodox god, and ranks me with the pagans. How much justice and truth there are in his claims I leave with you to decide.

"'It certainly cannot be claimed, with any truth, that his people, his worshipers, and originators were superior to other nations which existed at the same time either in intel-

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE 19TH CENTURY.

ATHALIAH AND HULDAH THE PROPHETESS.

Second Kings, chapters xi, and Second Chronicles, chapters xxii and xxiii, give an interesting account of the reign and death of Ahaziah and the ascension to the throne of his mother—Athaliah—after she had destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah, as she supposed. But one of king Ahaziah's sons escaped—her grandson—who at the end of six years was made king, herself being dethroned and slain, but not in the house of the Lord, but at the entering of the horse-gate, for so the priest said (2 Chron. xxiii, 14, 15). It was no crime to slay the queen, if the house of the Lord was not polluted with her blood.

She is not called a "godly" woman in Holy Writ, but "that wicked woman" (2 Chron. xxiv, 7). We cannot perceive why, as she but followed in the footsteps of her godly predecessors, David, Solomon, and a host of others, who were holy men after God's own heart. They secured themselves upon the throne through intrigue, usurpation, and the destruction of all the rightful heirs to the crown, and why not she? Surely, what was righteous and godly in them could not be wicked and ungodly in her! She was inhumanly slain by the priests, at God's command, for the same deeds for which others were preserved and blessed.

God struck Ananias and Sapphira dead for consenting to a lie, when against the interests of his chosen Zion; but according to 1 Samuel, xvi, 2, he instructed that holy prophet how to act a lie; put a lying spirit in the mouths of all these thy prophets (four hundred) (1 Kings, xxii, 23); sends a strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned (2 Thes. ii, 11, 12); and in numerous other instances, like any Nero, Caligula, or earthly potentate, sacrificed all truth and honor in order to seat himself, through his sub-kings, on the throne of Israel or elsewhere, and reign over the children of men, through fraud, low cunning, and assassination of his opposers.

This God was a peculiar character, chameleon-like, changeful as the passing clouds! Poor Jezebel and Athaliah were condemned, destroyed, slain, and even their memories desecrated for pursuing precisely the same course as God's anointed, who are now unquestioned saints in glory..

In 2 Kings, chapters xxii, xxiii, and 2 Chronicles, chapter xxxiv, is related one of the most mysterious, astounding, and important facts or fictions connected with the Word of God, not excepting the advent of Jesus himself—no less an event than Hilkiah, the priest, finding the book of the law in the house of the Lord. (2 Chron. xxxiv, 15.) This book embraced the Levitical law, the whole code of morals of the Hebrews, and, as some biblical scholars contend, the Pentateuch also. Now this book was found only two hundred and eighty-seven years prior to the Christian era, and some eight hundred years after it is claimed to have been given by God to Moses on Mount Sinai. Where and how was it lost all this time that this old priest could find this one copy in the house of the Lord?

Imagine, if you please, after he had brushed off the dust of eight centuries, and discovered it to be God's only law to the world, his delivering it to Shaphan, the scribe, who read off at a galop what had been recorded in another language eight hundred years before on papyrus or engraven in hieroglyphics on stone. The old priest must have forged it at the time if anything of the kind was found or produced. And then what becomes of the Levitical law, the Ten Commandments, and other essentials delivered to the Hebrews by God through Moses amidst the thunders and lightnings, the thick cloud and voice of the trumpet, that sounded long and waxed louder and louder, while the old mountain was altogether in a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire, and the smoke ascended as the smoke of a furnace, the whole mount quaking greatly; and the Lord came down on the top of the mount, and Moses hallooed, and God answered by a voice, and called Moses up to the top of the mount, when the curtain is drawn, and his seance with Almighty God is hidden from mortal eyes, and only revealed to man through this law which Moses and itself declared written by the finger of God? Why, its authenticity sinks to a level with the Koran and the bible of the Mormons. Besides, the Levitical law and Pentateuch, engraven on stone, the only means of preserving records at the time it is said to have been given, would have required a storehouse as large as the Great Eastern to have hidden it in, where Hilkiah, tumbling over some old rubbish, chanced one day accidentally to stumble upon the precious treasure of hundreds of slabs of stone, when, in great astonishment, he exclaimed, "I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord!"

Oh, what a story! Please read it for yourselves in the infallible book, and consult the "Inquirer's Text Book" for particulars and comments, while we proceed to "Huldah the prophetess," who was consulted on this awful occasion. Yes, let us pass over in silence the plucking of beard, the tearing of hair, and the rending of clothes, and the rush to Huldah, the ancient female medium, to inquire of the Lord concerning the words of the book that was found so miraculously, for great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us, because our fathers have not hearkened unto the words of this book. (2 Chron. xxxiv, 13.) What a Lord, to be angry with his children even unto the third and fifteenth generation, because they and their fathers had not kept the commands in a book, which they had never seen and did not know existed!

But let us hear what Huldah has to say, for all now lies in her hands. But first let us pause and learn the parentage of this seeress. She was (Chron. xxxiv, 32) the wife of Shullum, the son of Tikvah, the son of Hasrah, keeper of the wardrobe. Now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the college; and they spake to her, and she answered them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell ye the man (king Josiah) that sent you to me. Then follows five verses of terrible anathema, cursing the place and people, because they had forsaken the Lord and burned incense to other gods to provoke him to anger; with conciliatory promises to King Josiah that his eyes should not see this evil. Then they read over this legible (?) law, sprinkled blood, roasted the passover, consisting of 7,600 small cattle and 800 oxen, so there was not holden such a passover from the days of the judges, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel and Judah. Such was the king's zeal that he not only slew all the priests and burnt their bones on the altars to pollute them, but rifled the sepulchers and burnt the bones therein also; and all this the result of one man pretending to find a book and one woman's declaring God's will concerning it. But she was a prophetess, therefore could err, and if deceived, I, the Lord have deceived that prophet (Ezek. xiv, 9), she might urge in self-defense.

Mediums of the nineteenth century, claim this assertion from God whenever you chance to make a mistake, and see if you cannot shame your Christian brethren out of the belief of the doctrine of infallible inspiration, Huldah the prophetess notwithstanding.

Discussion of the National Financial System.

BETWEEN DR. H. H. MORRISON AND JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

MR. TRUESDELL'S FOURTH LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since my third letter appeared in print, a large number of friends, both among hard and soft money advocates, hav charged me with being a little too severe in my criticism of Mr. Morrison's statement wherein he charges the national bank with earning over fifty per cent per annum upon their real capital.

It was claimed by many, and particularly by inflation friends, that I had taken advantage of a typographic error—that the printer had in some way mixed up my opponent's statement.

"It cannot be possible," said a prominent inflationist of this place, "that a man of Mr. Morrison's apparent intelligence would intentionally present to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a statement so grossly incorrect, conflicting, as it does, with every national bank statement published in the United States." But it is possible, and to-day Mr. Morrison has reproduced his remarkable statement with all its glaring inconsistencies. I am glad he has thus again committed himself, for it saves his friends from an apology. Let the statement stand, a monument to his logic, a key to his new system, a striking illustration of "fiat bookkeeping." Such arguments will soon let the life-blood out of the whole "fiat system."

I do not expect to convert you, Mr. Morrison, for you hav already declared yourself unqualifiedly an enemy to the national bank system, and "a man convinced against his will is of his own opinion still."

But if our readers will take your own witness, the Comptroller's Official Report to Congress for the year 1873 (page 55, part first), where you got your figures from a part of his statement, they will find these same figures in a different form, with the following result: Ratio of earnings to capital and surplus for the six months ending September 1, 1873, 5.46 per cent, instead of over fifty per cent per annum, as you hav it; capital of national banks, September 1, 1873, $488,100,951; surplus accumulated during life of the system, $118,113,848; total capital and surplus, $606,214 799; net earnings for six months, ending September 1, 1873, $33,122,000 Now, divide the net earnings by capital and surplus, add ciphers, and point off, we hav ratio of net earnings to capital and surplus 5.46 per cent, verifying the Comptroller's report.

The net earnings above include all income derived from capital, surplus fund, circulation, individual deposits, interest on their government bonds, rent of real estate, exchange, account, and all other sources of revenue.

The currency issued by the banks being a liability, like individual deposits and other debts, cannot be property deducted from their capital.

If we deduct from their capital what the banks owe their billholders, we can, with the same propriety, deduct what they owe their depositors. In September, 1873, these deposits alone amounted to over $620,000,000, which, added to their circulation, exceeded their capital by over 485,000,000, while their loans upon discounted notes amounted to more than $940,000,000.

If you, Mr. Morrison, are going into a detailed statement by fighting upon currency, the earnings of which are already included in the net earnings, it seems to me you should not ignore small amounts.

The Comptroller's statement, in gross, is correct; and if you are going into details, take the whole details, post both sides of the ledger correctly, and you will corroborate the Comptroller.

You charge me with "taking good care not to say a word about the six per cent gold semi-annual interest paid by the government on $400,000,000 of their capital." I did not mention anything of the kind for two reasons. First, Every dollar of revenue derived by the national banks from all sources, together with the interest upon all the government bonds owned by them, was included in the $33,000,000 of net earnings, and not being well up in "fiat bookkeeping," I did not put it in the second time.

Second, the national banks never owned 400,000,000 in gold interest six per cent bonds during the life of the system; the largest amount of gold interest-bearing six per cent bonds ever held by the national banks at one time was July 1, 1869, $255,000,000.

On the first of November last the national banks held for their circulation less than $364,000,000, of which less than one-sixth part bore interest at six per cent, as the following statement will show:

|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 6 per cent bonds deposited for circulation, | | | | | $ 59,315,450 |
| 5 | " | " | " | " | 131,301,600 |
| 4½ | " | " | " | " | 34 866 950 |
| 4 | " | " | " | " | 138 318 400 |
| | | | | Total, | 363,802,400 |

(See Comptroller's Report, 1879, part first, page 12.)

It must be remembered that these bonds were not created for the benefit of the banks or for any other owner either at home or abroad, but for the benefit of the government. When this government got in debt she borrowed money, giving in return her promises to pay in the form of bonds. Her creditors are among nearly all classes of people, and can be found in almost every country. Most of the national banks bought their bonds in the open market, paying in many cases a high premium. The banks are as justly entitled to the interest upon the bonds which they own and hav paid for as any individual would be.

Under the old banking system in this state, the banks were required to deposit at Albany with the comptroller real estate mortgages as security to their circulating notes. These mortgages were owned by the banks, and being simply left at Albany as collateral, no one ever questioned the right of the banks to the interest or rent upon their own property, neither will any just-reflecting person question the right of the national banks to the interest upon the government bonds now owned by them. It matters not to the government whether her creditors are banks or individuals, her obligations are neither increased nor diminished by changing the ownership of her bonds.

You charge me with treating you a little uncivilly. If so I will apologize; I did not mean to combat you personally—it is your ideas I mean to hit. You hav called the bankers and brokers very hard names—now I am both; and you don't hurt me at all. If I hav been a little rough it is because your statements hav been so grossly incorrect as to require radical treatment. I must tell you when you are wrong, or tacitly admit that wrong is right. Candidly, I think you heard the wrong noise when you were called upon to attack the national bank question, but I am not to blame for your mistakes. Had I challenged you to discuss dentistry, with which you are acquainted, and I know comparatively nothing, I should probably appear to-day before the public in about the same position which you occupy.

Your farm question, in the way you put it, bears no analogy to the national bank system. Your suppositions are like "Lord Dundreary's" ifs. In "Our American Cousin" his lordship asked the beautiful Georgiana "if she loved cheese?" "No," was the reply. Musing awhile, Dundreary again inquired, "Does your brother love cheese?" "I hav no brother," said she. The lord limped on a few steps in silence, then suddenly stopped and squealed in the lady's ear, "If you had a brother, would he love cheese?"

Now, Mr. Morrison, for your question. If I had a farm worth $100,000, and if I had an old uncle who did not know his liabilities from his assets, and if this rich old uncle should kindly allow me to giv my notes payable on demand to the amount of $90,000 by my securing him with $100,000 in good bonds for which I paid more than one hundred cents on the dollar and which were now worth more than par in the market; and if he should charge me for his indorsement, and surround me with all the conditions, taxes, etc., etc., imposed upon the national banks, and if he should then say to me, "Young man, you now hav $190,000 to work with, and to derive profits from, while your capital is in reality only $10,000," I would be very apt to reply, "Old man, go and soak your head. You are either just out of the lunatic asylum or you hav been taking lessons of my friend Morrison in 'fiat bookkeeping.'"

TIME TO BUILD.

Is it not about time, Mr. Morrison, for you to begin the building of your financial structure. You are the one to whom we look for improvement. Thus far you hav devoted your entire argument against our present system without giving our readers one ray of hope for anything better. You hav written four long letters full of bitter warfare without suggesting a single bona fide improvement.

In your relentless crusade you hav made but one point, and that point I conceded in the beginning of this discussion, and every economist in the world will agree with us both, that "our present system of finance is not perfected."

You hav vaguely hinted at a new monetary unit or measure of value, but when repeatedly asked to define it, your evasive answers lead me to think your new measure is entirely chimerical.

Instead of wasting your time making a senseless war upon the national banks and exhausting yourself to show what we all admit, that the old system of banking was not perfect, why not devote a part of your energies towards the discovery of a new and better one?

If you can devise a new system of banking superior in every respect to the present, you will not only score a point in this discussion, but nearly every true economist in the country will support you, and the entire business community will look upon you as one of the greatest benefactors of the human race.

INTEREST.

I will now briefly consider your fourth affirmation; which comes next in order and in number, viz., that "usury, now called interest, is a fraud and destructive of the best good of humanity, both materially and mentally."

This affirmation I deny; and to prove first that interest is not a "fraud," with your permission, Mr. Morrison, I will appeal to our standard authorities which you now recognize. Webster says: "Fraud. Guile, disguise, deceit, deception, trick; artifice by which the rights of another are injured; a stratagem intended to obtain some undue advantage; an attempt to gain or obtain an advantage over another by imposition or immoral means—particularly deception in contracts . . . either by stating falsehood or suppressing truth."

In every state in the Union the legal rate of interest is established by law, which is fully understood by the entire business community. So plain is this fact that every schoolboy of ordinary intelligence knows the legal rate of interest in his own state; and nearly every person who is old enough to transact any commercial business is aware of the fact that parties may legally contract at any rate of interest not exceeding that established by law, as they may agree; hence there is no fraud in simple interest when the contract is otherwise just, and is well understood by both parties before its execution. There can be no fraud in interest when there is no deception, no guile, no trick, no imposition, no falsehood, or suppression of the truth. Aside from the moral aspect of the question, however, we cannot lose sight of the inherent or natural laws of finance any more than we can ignore the law of gravitation. In scientific research we often find ourselves obliged to abandon imaginary principles and to consider the real or natural laws as they exist. We must grapple with the facts as they are, not always as we imagine they ought to be. Water will run down hill in obedience to the law of gravitation, irrespective of the good or evil it may produce; and labor—or capital, the product of labor—will always command a price if sold, or hire, if loaned, despite of all government laws to the contrary. The old adage, "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," may be very far from the truth, yet I believe all will concede that any valuable commodity is worth more in the hand to-day than the mere promise to deliver said commodity at some future time. This difference is the natural interest, the measure or amount of which is always controlled by surrounding circumstances. When an unjust price is agreed upon, the fault lies with the contracting parties, not in the inherent law of finance.

When a man eats too much wholesome food and becomes sick in consequence, we do not find fault with the laws of digestion, nor do we desire to repeal the "acts" of his stomach, but we condemn the individual for his gluttony.

When people make bad bargains and contract to pay more for a loan than it is worth to them, no one will deny there is an apparent injustice; so it is when they make the same mistakes and pay too much principal for labor, or any commodity, but no human law can be made to regulate commercial transactions so equitably as to fully protect every person from the evil effect of bad judgment. The capitalist could not loan for profit unless there were persons willing to borrow. But why do people borrow? Simply because they believe it will be to their advantage to do so, and men loan their capital for the same reason. It is largely the inducement for gain that creates them both. So long as we can anticipate to-day the product of future labor by borrowing, we realize at once an advantage which is everywhere recognized and is measured by a price. This advantage or price stimulates people to loan.

If it were possible to abrogate all law for the collection of interest and to practically annul or suspend the natural law of increase to the lender, we should nearly all seek to become borrowers at once, with very few among us willing to loan.

Every person would soon try to get in debt and to defer the payment thereof as long as possible. There would be no incentive to discharge existing obligations, but every inducement to create new ones. The desire to create property beyond our immediate demands would soon fade away. All income from trust estates left by industrious hands for the protection of innocent and helpless children would cease; all endowment funds for the support of colleges, asylums, hospitals, and other charitable institutions would become inactive and unproductive. The aged and decrepit who had secured a competency by a long life of industry, temperance, and economy would lose the earnings of their entire estates.

All savings banks and life insurance companies would cease to exist, and millions of helpless people who are now protected by these combinations of capital would soon be thrown upon the cold charity of a selfish, shiftless world.

Show Your Colors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has been truly said that a man cannot serve two masters, and never was this more pertinently true than in the case of the National Liberal League and the American Liberal Union. No man can belong to, much less be an officer in, both of these organizations and retain self-respect, much less the respect of clear-seeing and candor-loving men and women. On the 12th day of December, 1879, the directors of the National Liberal League of America unanimously adopted the following, among other resolutions:

Voted, That, in the judgment of the Board, the name National Liberal League has become so widely and injuriously associated in the public mind with attempts to repeal the postal law prohibiting the circulation of obscene literature by mail—with the active propagandism of demoralizing and licentious social theories—and with the support of officials and other public representatives who are on good grounds believed to have been guilty of gross immoralities, that it has been thereby unfitted for use by any organization which desires the support of the friends of "natural morality."

Voted, That for this reason the Directors of the National Liberal League of America recommend that the name of this organization be changed to American Liberal Union, and they respectfully submit this recommendation to their constituent Auxiliary Liberal Leagues for consideration and action.

A copy of these resolutions was sent to each of the Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League of America, and the Index publishes replies from several of them. From these replies we learn that six gentlemen whose names appear in the published report of the Cincinnati Express as Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League indorse, wholly or in part, the above slanderous resolutions. Two of them, Mr. Samuel L. Hill and Mr. Robert Collyer, hav requested that their names be dropped from the list of Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League. This was manly. No man can indorse the quoted resolution and honorably remain an officer or a member of the maligned League. Will Messrs. Felsenthal, Pott, Holmes, and Wise also come out manfully and sever their connection with an organization upon which the Board of Directors of their League heap such opprobrious epithets?

On the other hand, Col. Ingersoll, Dr. T. L. Brown, and the Hon. R. S. McCormick, all supposed to be friendly to the National Liberal League, are still claimed and paraded as Vice-Presidents of the malcontent organization. Show your colors, friends. The members of the Executive Committee for Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Carolina, Texas, and Virginia are the same in the organizations. "Under which king," comrades, fellow-members of the Executive Committee? Do you believe, gentlemen, that "The National Liberal League obeys the will of men whose purposes are as vicious and selfish as their policy is ruinous to the League's original objects?" Do you believe that "there is not a more corrupt set of men anywhere than the ring which now controls the National Liberal League?" So asserts the man who is President of the seceding organization, of which you are still published as Executive Committee. If he tells the truth you cannot honorably remain in the National Liberal League; if he does not you cannot honorably remain in his organization. Where do you stand gentlemen? Are you for us or for our unscrupulous enemies and slanderers? Show your colors, now.

I would ask Mr. Abbot why he retains the name of W. E. Copeland as member of the Executive Committee for Nebraska? Is that gentleman supposed to hav any sympathy with the little knot of purists who run the American Liberal League? It cannot be. Is "A Member of the Liberal League," who writes from Parkersburg, W. Va., the member of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League for the state, James Hutchinson, Esq.? Don't be afraid to sign your name, man! All that you can say, whoever you are, against D. M. Bennett, will not alienate from him a single true man or woman. He and his friends are as pure and true men and women as there are in this land to-day. They know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain them. You may howl about the "pernicious doctrines of Heywood's infamous pamphlet" until you are hoarse; it will avail you nothing. The more you abuse it the better it will sell, and the more its teachings will be accepted by thoughtful men and earnest women. It is the ax laid at the root of the tree of evil, and it will demolish "Christian morality" so sure as the tendency of the race is upward and onward.

The Index quotes the New York Independent as saying: "Why, Christianity, with all its motives and pledges, has hard work to keep up a fair average of membership, even though its churches are, like Mr. Abbot's new League, a picked secession from the ungodly world." So, so! And I imagine that "Mr. Abbot's new League" will not fare much better than the church. "This new League has come out from the other as the churches come out from the world." Pre-cise-ly. "Its members are a 'peculiar people,' selected, like the members of the church, on moral grounds." And it was a case of self-selection in both instances. How very moral we are, to be sure! "We commend to them the fight which they hav on their hands against immorality, and we pledge them the hearty sympathy of our similar secession." How acceptable such "sympathy" must be to little Francis! A few years ago how logically Mr. Abbot would hav proved that the church was not a "moral secession," but a creedal organization, and that Romanism was genuine Christianity! Verily, verily, when a man sets out to execute the crawfish walk, he is very apt to back into some strange company. The Independent continues:

"We hope that with what motives they can muster they will not 'go into retreat,' nor 'do nothing,' but will fight the good fight of works while we are fighting the good fight of faith."

I take it that in this article from the Independent, and in a similar one from the Christian Statesman, published in the same issue of the Index, we hav the publication of the banns of a proposed matrimonial alliance between the Christian church and the American Liberal Union. It is about time that such a step was taken, for they hav been holding illicit relations for so long that people begin to dread the consequences. Blessings upon their union! They seem to be very well adapted to each other.

It seems to me that that was a very large "5,000." Is there a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who has not received one or more copies of that "extra" Index? I received three copies, and hav neither seen nor heard from a single person who was then a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER who was not similarly favored. How did the "moral" editor get all the names?

In conclusion let me say to the friends of justice and freedom, Show your colors! Rebuke the traitors and the cowards who would deliver us, bound hand and foot, into the hands of the enemies of equal rights! Work for the National Liberal League! Stand by THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator, which hav stood so nobly by the oppressed and for liberty! Hold up the hands of the martyr-heroes, Heywood and Bennett! Work! work! Scatter the seeds of truth! Awaken the land!

E. C. WALKER.

Revival of the Reputation of Paine.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With all the foolhardy ventures church power is making on well-recognized individual liberty, progress of the recent past is apparent, not only in celebrations to the honor of Paine, and a wide call for his productions, but in the tone of slanders by which people of many nations were prejudiced against him. The scenes of spite and rage manifest twenty years ago, on a favorable mention of his name, would not be risked now by those who see the active means to render justice. And, take note, this change comes of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its coadjutors' efforts to rescue truth and arrest the course of falsehood.

At a Fourth of July celebration at Norwich, N. Y., in 1858, a banquet was spread, at which toasts formed the literary feature. My brother, Edwin A. Tillotson, gave "Thomas Paine," and before he could repeat the commendation, clergymen roared, "Too late to dig up the ashes of Tom Paine," bigots hurled burning cigars by scores at his head, and those dazed with rum, cried, "Put him down!" It was all I could do to keep the tobacco brands from wrath's eternal fires from burning the hair and face of love's serene apostle.

Here is the toast: "Thomas Paine, the patriot author of the Revolution; the paper bullets of his brain routed loyalty to kings from the breasts of Americans, a victory underlying the triumphs of Washington. Honor to whom honor is due."

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

"Good Lord, Deliver Us."

Did you go to church the other day and see the old bishop decorated in his holy robes? Aaron used to hav a pair of holy breeches, but the good Lord without doubt is trying to keep up with the times, so he has substituted the bishop's present regalia in place of the holy breeches of old.

The holy man sets the pattern by rolling his eyes heavenward and saying, "Good Lord, deliver us!" Then the whole congregation respond by saying, "Good Lord, deliver us!" And while they were talking there was also a poor Irish mother hugging her starving little child to her breast, saying, "Good Lord, deliver us! Deliver me and my innocent little child from starvation!"

But did the Lord comply with her request? No! The poor mother lingered on, on and on, until she became a skeleton; and at last, when her strength could sustain her emaciated form no longer, she sank to the floor and died, whilst her quivering lips were still trying to articulate, "Good Lord, deliver us!" And even now, at this very moment, there are thousands of poor, pitiable creatures in Ireland who are starving to death for the want of food.

If the "good Lord" will refuse the petitions of the starving, how can it be expected that he will listen to the petitions of the rich? In my judgment, it requires a good deal of cheek for a man or a woman whose purse and larder are well filled to get up before an intelligent audience and ask the good Lord to deliver them. If the Lord is in the delivering business, he can just at this time find plenty to do among the unfortunate colored people of Kansas, or among the starving thousands of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. I wonder if Victoria, in her responses, says it with a good deal of fervor? It seems to me that if I were she I would rely less on the "good Lord" and go into the delivering business myself. I understand that she has given to the Relief Fund but a single day's income to feed her starving slaves. I think she might hav gone one day better, in consideration of the fact that she prides herself on being the head of a Christian government.

The skin of a baked potato to a starving mother is worth more than all of the utterances of "Good Lord, deliver us" that were ever uttered by the whole human family.

Then, instead of paying the priest for repeating such twaddle and nonsense, let men with their money pay for potatoes for the starving, and they will hav done much better than they now do by paying the priest for his useless "Good Lord, deliver us!" Prayer never yet raised a peck of potatoes, and it never will. A man may pray and praise God every day in his life, but if he wants any potatoes he must plant and dig. His neighbor may curse God every day of his life, and he can raise just as good potatoes, and as many in a hill, if he will plant and dig, as can his godly neighbor. And the starving, if he wants potatoes, must rely on man if he wants relief.

ligence, civilization, scientific knowledge, art, literature, or morals. They were crude semi-barbarians; and there is not to-day, in any part of the little territory they occupied, a rock, a stone, or one single proof of their having excelled in architecture, sculpture, monument building, or anything of the kind; while in Egypt, Persia, and my own country there are remains of this kind which are far older than the time when the Jews lived in Palestine, and the same will continue thousands of years longer as enduring proofs of the ancient intelligence and enterprise of those nations. This mere handful of people who occupied that small tract of country were all of the inhabitants of the earth who knew anything about their tuteiar deity or cared anything about him; and he showed equally as much indifference towards other nations as he did toward his own little family. He showed not the slightest amount of love, kindness, sympathy, or patience for anybody except the Jews, and he seemed to want to exterminate them to the extent of his ability. It looks very singular how such an obscure, contracted, neighborhood god could be the creator of the universe and the father of all the nations of the earth. It is a problem difficult to solve.

"'As a closing remark, I wish to say that I cannot see that there are any better proofs of his amiable character, of his goodness to mankind, and even of his existence, than is possessed by the rest of us. I certainly think there are stronger proofs that I have really existed than he can produce of his existence, and that more goodness pertained to my system of instruction and laws than his. There are no better proofs of his existence and of his almighty power than of either one of you here present. Somebody said you had an existence, that you created the universe, that you had revealed your will to men, and that many of you sent them a code of laws and injunctions, and that is all that can be said of him. All that anybody knows of him is what somebody said, who knew just as much about him as those to whom it was told. You all stand on the same ground in this respect. My friends, I thank you for your patience. I will trouble you no longer.'

"As soon as this speaker had taken his seat there was an immense clapping of hands, stamping of feet, and cries of 'Hear! Hear! Bravo! Bravo!' etc. The entire concourse seemed thoroughly pleased with what this vigorous god from India had spoken. As soon as the tumult was over the representative from Palestine was on his feet, but benignity and amiability were not visible in his countenance; perturbation and impatience were easily perceived. He turned his face towards Jesus, who was sitting a few feet to his left, and, with a slight tremor in his voice, addressed him thus: 'My son, can you not say something in my behalf? You see how this assembly seem opposed to me.' The Nazarene exhibited a slight degree of reluctance to being called out, but nevertheless slowly arose and cast his eyes from one to another, as though in painful meditation, when he spoke as follows:

"'My compeers of the celestial spheres, I did not propose to have anything to say on this occasion, as I come far more intent to hear than to be heard. I cannot help feeling regretful that the discussion has taken the turn it has. I would much have preferred perfect harmony, both in sentiment and expression. I can say I have no ill-will toward any one present, or in fact toward a single being anywhere else. If I know myself I feel a spirit of kindness toward all living beings. As regards the position my father has taken, I must say I do not quite approve of it. I could wish he had shown more amiability and complaisance toward you all; but I hope you will attribute it to the true source—his natural disposition. I wish to cast no reflections upon any of you, or to detract from the merits you possess. We are all just what we are, and our characters and qualities, as has been remarked, are due to the source whence we obtained our existence. I do not wish to dwell upon this point.

"'When I was performing my mission work on the earth some eighteen hundred and fifty years ago, I made it a special point to say all I could in favor of my paternal relative. I felt full of love and kindness to all beings, and I fully believed he possessed the same disposition. Having this conviction strongly implanted in my mind, I did not hesitate to say publicly and privately that my heavenly father was all love, goodness, and kindness. I felt as though I could not say too much in that direction, and expressed the conviction on all suitable occasions. If I misstated the facts I sincerely regret it, and I have sometimes thought that the record does not bear me out in what I did say of him. I feel the force of what the last speaker said, and cannot refute a word we have heard from him. I could even wish that the record of my father's past career was somewhat different from what it is; but wishing in this instance and most others is without avail. The inevitable must always be accepted, and should be done with the best grace possible. I have felt charitable toward him, and have readily overlooked his natural disposition. I have aided him all I could, and I flatter myself that I have introduced him into many countries and to many peoples who would not otherwise have known much about him. I feel positive he has an immensely larger following for my efforts than he otherwise would have had. I am glad of this, and feel that I have thereby discharged a filial duty which I cannot regret.

"'I will frankly say to you on the subject of gods that I think the world has had far too many of them. If they had had fewer gods, less fealty to bestow upon them, and more love for one another, with an active disposition to do all in their power and make each other happy—less divinity and more humanity—I believe the world would have been much the better for it. Much could be said upon this subject, but the hour is getting late, you are becoming weary, and I will not detain you with further remarks at this time.'

"This speaker," continued Mercury, "made a very favorable impression upon the audience, and he was warmly applauded. Many pleasant, smiling faces were turned towards him. Even his father seemed to feel much better for what the son had said, and a good feeling prevailed all around.

"At this point Mithra of Persia arose, in a graceful manner for one so ancient, and said he felt that a due amount of gallantry had not been extended to the ladies—the goddesses—and for one he would be pleased to hear from them. All the gods joined in applause. The goddesses, who were principally sitting in a body by themselves, seemed to be pleased with this mark of attention and remembrance, and whispered a few minutes among themselves, when Isis, of Egypt, arose with a good deal of queenly dignity, and, with a smile upon her face, said that she and her sisters wished to return thanks for the courtesy just shown them, and to assure the brethren that they had taken more pleasure in listening than they would have done in speaking. They had all been deeply interested in what they had heard, and heartily sympathized with it. Doubtless many of them would cheerfully add their own thought to what the lords had said, but as the time was now so far advanced, as many of them had a long distance to go, and some little matters to attend to when they got home, she thought they would all beg to be excused from speaking. She turned to the goddesses and said: 'Sisters, if this is the way you feel in the matter, please manifest it by saying Aye.'

"The clear, shrill 'Aye' which immediately followed was very audible, and not at all unpleasant. A good feeling was manifest.

"At this juncture Jahveh arose, looking more pleasant than at any other time during the meeting, and said if he had made any hasty remarks he hoped the convention would excuse him. A hearty 'Aye, aye' rang round the entire audience. He said further he could not deny the strictures that had been made by the gentleman from India, and that he would endeavor to profit by them. He then remarked that the day was getting too far spent to further consider at this time the object for which the convention was called, and he wished to make a motion that the Chair appoint a committee of five, three gods and two goddesses, to take the subject in charge and consider the propriety of calling the convention together again three weeks from that date if they saw fit to do so. Apollo, of Greece, seconded the motion. Indra then put the question by 'rising vote.' The motion was adopted by about seventy-five majority; the small gods, the "tag-rag and bobtail," carrying the question; the big gods mostly voting the other way. The Chair then appointed the committee as follows: Chairman, Jahveh, of Palestine; Thor, of Scandinavia; Mercury, of Greece; Astarte, of Babylon, and Minerva, of Greece and Rome. The appointments were satisfactory, and the convention adjourned. After another general hand-shaking all around, the gods and goddesses left in national companies for their respective places of abode.

"Now," continued Mercury," as soon as I had finished a draft of the notes I took of the proceedings, I came to see you, Bennett, and let you know what we have done."

"I am very much obliged to you," I rejoined, "for your kindness, and for your very interesting recital. I hav been highly interested by it."

"Now," said he hurriedly," it is getting late, and I must return to the heavenly spheres. How does the matter strike you? and what do you think you will do about your book?"

"Well," said I, "as the general sentiment in heaven is in favor of my going ahead, and as I believe it agrees with what my friends on earth feel about it, I shall go ahead and get the book out as soon as I reasonably can."

"Good enough for you," said he; "I glory in your spunk, and I don't think any very strong opposition will be made against you from the upper regions. You certainly will have none from me. Now I must go. Good night! I shall try to see you again later."

Then I saw him no more. In the morning I had a clear recollection of what I had heard from my visitor, and the remembrance was pleasant. I have thought it over a good deal since, and have about concluded that I have had a remarkable dream.

In the mean time I am drawing my book to a close, and I trust it will be out in due time. I think I shall be able to supply all with copies who desire. Please send in your orders, so we may know how many to print.

Sincerely your friend, D. M. Bennett.

Honor to Mr. Bennett.

The sentence of the editor of The Truth Seeker expires the last of April, then, unless Hayes pardons him (which there is little likelihood of his doing), he will return to his friends and business. The Defense Association, feeling that his advent into freedom should be signalized by a demonstration of joy, and wishing to hav the festivities properly prepared, issued the following card:

To the Friends of Mr. D. M. Bennett: If not pardoned by the President, Mr. D. M. Bennett's term of imprisonment will expire on the 29th of April. It is the desire of many of his friends to giv him a reception which shall distinguish a brave martyr to free press and free speech from a common criminal who may hav been justly incarcerated. A meeting to take this matter into consideration will take place at 120 Lexington avenue, corner E. 28th street, New York, on Monday evening, March 8th, at 8 o'clock. Will you kindly favor the meeting with your presence? Please bring this card with you and present it at the door.

E B Foote, Jr., M.D.,

By order of the Association.

In response about fifty friends gathered in the spacious and elegant rooms of Dr. Foote. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., called the assemblage to order, and T. C. Leland was chosen chairman. Short speeches were made by several gentlemen, many plans were put forward, and Dr. Foote, Sr., Ingersoll Lockwood, Daniel E. Ryan, M. Reiman, and T. C. Leland were elected a committee to arrange the reception, with power to add to their number and act in the matter. As soon as the committee decide upon their action they will report. ## Prof. Rawson Sick.

We regret to announce that Prof. Rawson, Secretary of the League, is prostrated with gastric fever. He has not been out for three weeks. He hopes his correspondents will hav patience a few days longer, when he will be able to reply to their favors.

The friend who sent us Charles Stephenson's beautiful poem, on the "Efficacy of Prayer," with the request to republish, is informed that it originally appeared in The Truth Seeker. It was about the last poem our friend wrote before his death. He was a poet of no mean pretensions, and his "Cuban Martyrs" contains many beautifully expressed Liberal sentiments.

"SUPERSTITION; the Religion of Believe or be Damned," is the title of M. Babcock's open letter to the St. John's School Board. It contains a picture of "Theology at Work," and one of the Jewish Jehovah. It is written in Mr. Babcock's well-known forcible style that has delighted so many of our readers, and is crammed with facts and arguments. The "Catechism" is alone worth more than the price of the work. It was originally intended to publish it for 15 cents, but the author had too much valuable matter on hand, and we were forced to put it at 25 cents, or five for a dollar. We shall be pleased to send it to all our friends.

OUR friend, Mrs. Henrietta L. Buckner, graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Keokuk, Iowa, March 2d. We wish her success in the field she has chosen.

Anti-Liberty Logic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX: When a logician mounts a figure of speech his own legs become useless. He may ride into his own camp or that of the enemy, according to the nature of the animal under him. There never was a better illustration of this general principle than the little argument which the Index of February 12th puts forth against those members of the National Liberal League who are in favor of the total repeal of the Postal laws which exclude certain publications from the national mails. The Index cannot but be aware that the National League, as such, has taken no action on the question of repeal, but has publicly called for the impartial execution of the law. Yet it shamelessly persists in accusing the League, as a body, of seeking the repeal of the law for the very purpose of promoting the circulation of corrupt literature. It has not offered, and cannot offer, one particular of proof that any single member of the National League seeks the repeal of the law for that purpose, or that its repeal would hav any such result. It seeks to form a union of Liberals and others, who shall be unanimously opposed to the repeal, and yet in favor of the perfect secularity of the state. The National Liberal League wishes it all possible success; but it cannot expel from its membership men and women who conscientiously believe that the Colgate and Comstock law is unjust, unconstitutional, ridiculous, hypocritical, and dangerous to American liberty; that it is in fact a priestly usurpation, a disgrace to national legislation, and in its execution hitherto a proof of judicial corruption.

The little argument of the Index, on which its anti-repeal movement is to proceed harmoniously with Howard Crosby and Joseph Cook, is as follows (I quote heading and all):

THE LOGIC OF "REPEAL," AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Resolved, That we are in favor of destroying the dams.
Resolved, That we are totally opposed to the rush of the waters after the dams are destroyed.
Resolved, That whoever says we are in favor of flooding the country is either a fool, a knave, or a Christian, which is the same thing.

Here are two figures of speech—a nice span—under this logical Ducrow. "Dams" on the near side, and "rush of the waters" on the off. Now, what does Ducrow mean by "dams?" Does he include among them that d——d liar, Comstock, and that learned and pious justifier of lies, Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby? What does he mean by "rush of the waters?" Not a single member of the League has sought to destroy any dam, except one which was built by stealth six or seven years ago, and the whole strength of which has rested on a single liar ever since. Are there no other dams? If this should break down entirely, would the "rush of waters," whatever that may be, be much worse than before? Well, if it would not be, then subtracting all the dams from the major premise except this particular dam, the whole syllogism becomes unobjectionable, so far as I, for one, am concerned. But the major premise is still false, so far as concerns the National Liberal League; for it distinctly resolved at its last Congress that it would not lift a finger to touch that dam. It left it go to the "demnition bow-wows" by its own weight of lying and hypocrisy.

If by the "rush of waters" the logical Ducrow means "dirty waters," he might hav well added "coward" to the three epithets in his third resolution.

The same number of the Index declares that the "Free-love ring which at once rules and ruins the National Liberal League" is pushing a new petition for repeal. This I hope is true. I should be glad to sign the petition. I believe every intelligent and honest man and woman will. But whether the "Freelove ring" ruins the League or not, it is not true that it rules it. If it were true, whose fault would it be more than that of those who seceded before any vote was taken on the question of repeal?

Here follows another sentence, full of logic, which cuts its own throat:

"This persistent attempt to get rid of the only effective statute against the sale and circulation of matter declared to be criminal by the common law was first instigated, and is now again secretly urged forward, by parties who found their infamous profits cut down and their infamous business crippled."

Common law existed before 1873. Here it is gravely asserted that it was ineffective. By whose fault was that? Did the "Freelove ring" rule the world in all those years?

Who are the "parties who found their infamous profits cut down and their infamous business crippled," and are now "secretly" urging forward the petition for repeal? I know plenty of men and women who are doing it openly. They of course are not meant. It would hav been braver in the Index to hav named the parties who are doing it in secret. Indeed, if it knows who they are, and that their "infamous profits hav been cut down," they are still indictable at common law in state courts; and the Index, as a good citizen, should at least send their names to the proper prosecuting officer for the use of a grand jury.

The only approach to a specific, manly, and tangible charge which the Index makes is in quoting from "an influential New York paper," the name and date of which it does not giv, a paragraph on the then "recent discovery of the body of a murdered girl in a trunk at Lynn." The writer alleges that this discovery "brought to light the terribly significant fact that over six hundred women, some married, some single, are recently missing from their homes within a not very large geographical province, of which Boston may be regarded as a center. Most of them were believed by their friends to hav given themselves up to a life of shame." Admitting the statistical accuracy of this writer, which is not easy to do without seeing a list of these six hundred women, it by no means follows that his next sentence is credible. He goes on to say, "This is the terrible fruitage of such seed as Heywood and Bennett are sowing."

Here we hav something tangible—something to exercise our reason and common sense upon; not an unincorporated association which cannot sue or be sued, but two individual persons who can be indicted and punished, and who, if falsely charged with having made profits out of an infamous and illegal business, by a party pecuniarily responsible, can sue and recover damages. The writer in "the influential New York paper," however, does not charge them with anything but sowing seed, which is not actionable. The Index escapes liability to a libel suit by not naming these parties as among the parties who hav made profits by an infamous business. Whatever its disposition may hav been, it did not quite hav the courage to say that Heywood and Bennett hav made profits out of an infamous business. It lugs in a paragraph from a nameless editor, who alleges before a credulous public that a "murdered girl in a trunk" and "six hundred women" gone astray are "the fruitage of such seed as Heywood and Bennett are sowing." Does the Index indorse this figure of speech and expect us to swallow it whole? It knows, or ought to know, that on the little pamphlet for which Heywood and Bennett were unrighteously, and to the eternal disgrace of the United States judiciary, imprisoned, neither of them would ever hav made a cent of profit but for the absurd prosecution, which was the natural consequence of the ridiculous and unconstitutional legislation. Possibly the fruitage of six hundred and one ruined women, admitting that they were ruined, all came from the extra seed sown by means of that very unprofitable liar, Anthony Comstock. But, in the matter of seed-sowing, what is that trifling, prosaic, and unpalatable little pamphlet compared with the teaching of Christendom; that the wisest of the human race had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; that he was divinely inspired to write Solomon's Song, and that God commissioned Mordecai to save his peculiar people by prostituting his niece to an old libertine who had just divorced his wife because she would not submit to an abominable indignity? Here, in point of fact, we hav, in this boasted refuge of liberty, science, and civilization, an ecclesiastical usurper making use of corrupt politicians and subservient judges to strain at an ephemeral, microscopic gnat in our literature, while an old idolized camel is allowed free circulation in every infant-school and Sabbath-school in the land to be swallowed whole!

Mr. Parton's Tribute and Trust.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Absence from home makes me late again. Better late than never. In eight weeks more you will see your chief again, I trust, well and joyous, a wiser and better man than when he left you.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

A Gift from Mr. E. M. Davis.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the struggle that you are making for "free speech, free press, and free mails," I feel that I should help you, at least so far as to send you ten dollars, which I inclose. Keep these grand ideas before your readers, and Abbot will cease to repeat his false representations and Comstock will be put out of his position.

Whilst writing it has occurred to me to ask you to publish the following circular letter, which appears in the National View of the 14th of February. Giv us your views as to the dastard that did what I charge, and aid me in finding out who did it, and then of turning him out of the Greenback party. Respectfully, E. M. DAVIS.

205 Walnut place, Philadelphia, Pa., Mar. 5, 1880.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., 1st Mo. 26, 1880.

DEAR SIR: You name is given to me as one who was in Washington on the 8th and 9th of January, at the "Conference" of the friends of the Greenback Labor movement.

You are, therefore, no doubt, aware that the "Conference" appointed a large committee to consider the questions brought before it, consisting of one delegate from each state, all the members of the National Executive Committee, all the Greenback members of Congress, and some other persons in sympathy with the Greenback Labor organizations. You also know that this committee was large and its business important, and the Conference adjourned over one session to await its action. You also know that the committee reported an address, or call, which was read to the Conference by Mr. De La Matyr, and adopted without dissent. But are you aware that that call was not published, and that an important portion of it was stricken out after it was read and adopted, and before it reached the public through the press? Such i the fact, disgraceful as it is. In view of these facts I ask:

To whom did Mr. De La Matyr hand the call after he had read it to the Conference? Can the secretaries of the Conference to whom it should hav gone tell? Can the editors of the National View tell who gave them the manuscript? Can they or any one else tell where the manuscript or proof now is? The Greenback Labor constituency want to know who did this dastardly act, that he may be branded as one not to be trusted by honest men. Need I say that to acquiesce in this theft is to sanction it, and to sanction it is to make our characters as black as that of the person who did it? What epithet should we affix to the person who mutilates "our call?" I am at a loss to find words. Denis Kearney, now is your chance! Will you not turn your artillery against this dishonorable act? Will you giv us the title that should encircle this man, that it may be stamped so indelibly on his forehead that Cain will no longer be the only "marked" man among men?

I write to every member of the Conference, hoping that they will feel as I do, and will help me ferret out and expose this betrayal of a sacred trust. How much of the call was mutilated I do not know. Although I am asserting the fact that nobody but the Conference had any right to make any change, I will quote some of the words that I know were read by De La Matyr, and were not published. When the committee drew up the call for the Convention for the 9th of June, in Chicago, they enumerated the organizations that were invited to send delegates, and in the list as read to the Conference "suffrage reformers" were included. It was these two words that were stricken out.

It will be no excuse for the dastard, when he creeps out before the public, to say, as the person who turned a railway switch just before an express train, freighted with a thousand lives, was to pass: "It was a very little thing I did."

But whether in his or your estimation it be small or large, the right to do it at all is the point!

But it was not an unimportant thing. It was a serious thing, growing daily more serious, for there is nothing surer than this, that when in a nation over half of its citizens are prevented from using the right of suffrage, the rights of the other half are in danger. Nor was it inappropriate in a Conference composed of men boasting their hostilities to all monopolies, as it cannot be denied that the most gigantic monopoly in this land is the monopoly men uphold when they claim that they only are the proper citizens to make the laws and govern the country.

In addition to sending this paper to you, I feel it my duty to make its contents as public as possible. The act was a public insult. No private excuse, palliation, or explanation can be accepted. It must be publicly condemned if we wish to save ourselves from its repetition. To me it is as clear as the noonday sun that the man who committed this high-handed outrage would do anything to gain his ends, if he thought he could not be detected.

Winwood Reade on the Christian God.

The doctrine of rewards and punishments in a future state is comparatively modern; the authors of the Iliad, the authors of the Pentateuch, had no conception of a heaven or a hell; they knew only Hades or Scheol, where men dwelt as shadows, without pain, without joy; where the wicked ceased from troubling and the weary were at rest. The sublime conception of a single God was slowly and painfully attained by a few civilized people in ancient times. The idea that God is a being of virtue and of love has not been attained even in the present day, except by a cultivated few. Such is the frailty of the human heart that men, even when they strive to imagine a perfect being, stain him with their passions, and raise up an idol which is defective as a moral form. The God of this country is called a God of love; but it is said that he punishes the crimes and even the errors of a short and troubled life with torture which will have no end. It is not even a man which theologians create, for no man is quite without pity; no man, however cruel he might be, could bear to gaze forever on the horrors of the fire and the rack; no man could listen forever to voices shrieking with pain, and ever crying out for mercy and forgivness. And if such is the character of the Christian God, if such is the idea which is worshiped by compassionate and cultivated men, what are we to expect in a barbarous age? The God of Job was a sultan of the skies, who, for a kind of wager, allowed a faithful servant to be tortured, like the man who performed vivisection on a favorite dog, which licked his hand throughout the operation. The Jehovah of the Pentateuch was a murderer and bandit; he rejoiced in offerings of human flesh. The gods of Homer were lascivious and depraved. The gods of savages are merely savage chiefs. God, therefore, is an image of the mind, and the image is ennobled and purified from generation to generation as the mind becomes more noble and more pure. Europeans believe in eternal punishment, partly because it has been taught them in their childhood and because they hav never considered what it means; partly because their imaginations are sluggish, and they are unable to realize its cruelty; and partly also, it must be feared, because they hav still the spirit of revenge and persecution in their hearts. The author of Job created God in the image of an oriental king, and in the East it is believed that all men by nature belong to the king, and that he can do no wrong. The Bedouins of the desert abhorred incontinence as a deadly sin; but brigandage and murder were not by them considered crimes. In the Homeric period, piracy was a profession, and vices were customs of the land. The character of a god is that of the people who hav made him. When, therefore, I expose the crimes of Jehovah, I expose the defective morality of Israel; and when I criticise the God of modern Europe, I criticise the defective intellects of Europeans. The reader must endeavor to bear this in mind; for though he may think that his idea of the Creator is actually the Creator, that belief is not shared by me.—Martyrdom of Man.

Freethought and Crime.

[In the late discussion between Dr. J. P. Newman and Ingersoll Lockwood upon the subject of "Freethought and Crime," in the columns of the Evening Post, that journal declined to publish the following reply of Mr. Lockwood to the Doctor's "demands for proof :"]

It is a maxim in equity jurisprudence that he "who asks for equity must do equity." But now comes Dr. Newman without having made good his charge against Freethought in his sermon of the 9th ult. and demands proof for what he is pleased to term my "assumptions." In other words, he sets me a task that he hopes may crush me. I don't say that he'll be hoist with his own petard, for that would be indelicate, but I do say that the spirit he'll raise will be—well, a very uncomfortable one to control. I now take up his demands seriatim :

First, That Christianity is responsible for the increase of crime. I've made out my case on this point, and the bill must be taken pro confesso against him unless he can overcome the evidence adduced in this and former letters ; or, admitting the correctness of my figures in relation to crime in Scotland and England, he will be forced to the conclusion that Christianity possesses no peculiar virtue or "vital force" that deters from crime, which admission will be quite as satisfactory to me.

Second, That Christianity is without a code of practical ethics. Aye, true it is. In fact I might say I know no book less likely to inculcate a sweet, poetic love of truth, a genuine respect for truth, a profound, invulnerable, and inexpugnable reverence for the truth, whether it pays or not, than the Bible. In it men and women, loved of God, deceive, lie, cheat, steal, murder, pillage, massacre, betray, deny, and commit crimes not to be named in the columns of a journal founded by the pure Bryant. With rare exceptions, the women of the Bible are either harlots or slaves. Look at them—Sarah, Hagar, Rachel, Delilah, Esther, Potiphar's wife, Magdalene, and the Samarian woman. Look at the monsters of iniquity, Abraham, Jacob, Lot, Isaac, David, Saul, Solomon, Jephthah, Absalom, Amnon, etc. Look at the polygamists, David, Esau, Solomon, Elkanah. But more than all this, injunctions, direct and divine, to commit crime abound. Vide Ex. xi, 2, where there is a command to commit larcency ; vide Deut. xiv, 21, where there is a divine permission to sell meat that has died to the aliens; vide Deut. xxiii, 20, where may be found God's permission to exact usury of the stranger; vide Josh. viii and x, for divine direction to burn, pillage, slay, and massacre men, women, and children ; vide Rom. iii, 7, where Paul inculcates lying for the greater glory of God ; vide Phil. i, 7, et seq., where this same Paul, a self-confessed accessory to murder (vide Acts xxvi, 10) appears in the character of a slave-driver, a livery which the church was destined in later ages (to its everlasting shame be it said) to wear with the ease of an every-day garb. (See letters of Oliver Johnson, lately published in the Tribune.) And further, vide the Old and New Testaments passim for the marks and badges of inferiority, servitude, and tutelage set upon woman, the fetters of which—thanks to the progress of human enlightenment—were riven asunder in our state, in the years 1848, '49, '60, and '62, by the enactment—with the several amendments—of the so-called "Married Woman's Acts."

But I must hurry on. Dr. Newman calls my attention to the Ten Commandments. They are at best but the code of a barbarous age. To the grandeur and efficiency of the Roman and common law must be attributed human progress, science and art lending a helping hand. The Ten Commandments were the strong bulwarks of the slave-holder. They are silent on human slavery, silent on wrongs to woman, abandonment, seduction, etc.; silent on usury, bigamy, polygamy, treason, all crimes against fatherland, bribery, and gambling (how unlike the Koran ! "games of hazard are accursed of God "), silent on the use of wine. How unlike the Koran again!

Right here let me say the Bible has been and ever will be the refuge and shibboleth of the wine drinker, and hence immediately responsible for the spread of crime. The world is dying for a religion that shall set bounds to the use of wine. With the good food, warm clothing, and dwellings of modern days, the use of wine and stimulants becomes unnecessary.

I am a fanatic on this subject. I believe that moderation in the use of alcohol is a human impossibility, and that drunkenness (not necessarily more than mental excitation) is the very mother of crime !

I take up Dr. Newman's third demand for proof that Jesus looked upon this life as a mere "transition state" (I beg Dr. Newman to quote me correctly. I did not say 'contemptible view of life "), and that he (Jesus) had vague and shadowy notions of law, ethics, domestic relations, etc. To the mind of the young Jewish teacher, which was ever stretched so tense upon the pins of love, hope, pity, imagination, as to tremble responsive to every stir and breath in the environment, the world was upon the eve of destruction. (Luke xxi, 32 ; Mark xiii, 30 ; Luke ix, 27, and elsewhere.)

As a condition precedent to becoming his disciple, one must hate his very life (Luke xiv, 26). He discourages marriage (Matt. xix, 10 et seq.). In this behalf, too, Paul utters a despicable opinion ; it is needless for me to locate it. At Mat. v, 32, Jesus gives utterance to a fearful sentiment, in that he views man as master of the woman, and accords him power "to put her away" for cause.

By all means let us hav a Liberal divorce law, for human affection can neither be created nor preserved by statute enactment ; but to make the husband a judge of the law and fact is simply a barbarity. He teaches non-resistance (four gospels—passim), and Sunday after Sunday the churches echo the words in very mockery, as it were, for at this moment in Europe ten million three hundred and thirty-four thousand human beings stand ready to leap at each other's throats; and this curse of standing armies rests most heavily upon the poor and the lowly. Such a religion is simply a school for hypocrisy.

But further, in Mat. xx, 1, et seq., we find the destructive doctrine that a man may do what he likes with his own, even to wronging his fellow-man. Modern equity cries, "Nay, in no sense of the word can a man do what he likes with his own, for the simple reason—outside of moral considerations—that the law permits no absolute ownership."

In Mat. xvii, 19, is found a senseless cursing (senseless at all times) of a barren fruit-tree. It shows an incredible ferocity in one usually so mild-tempered to curse the neglected plant and not the neglecting husbandman.

At Mat. xxvi, 52, Jesus utters those terrible words upon which men hav so long based their right to commit a greater crime than murder itself, to wit, murdering the murderer.

At Luke viii, 1, et seq., we find the young Nazarene encouraging married women to follow him and use their husband's property for his maintenance.

At Luke xv, 2, et seq., may be found the demoralizing and destructive sentimentality of the story of the Prodigal Son.

At Luke xviii, 22 and 25, bursts forth, as elsewhere it does, a blind and unreasoning hatred of property and the rich, and in these times a very dangerous glorification of the poor.

In the first chapter of John, 1, et seq., he sets more wine before guests at a wedding feast already so intoxicated as not to be able to distinguish good wine from bad.

He speaks no reproof to the woman of Samaria at John iv, 18; and at John viii, 1, et seq., sends the adulteress away with forgiveness.

Oh, monstrous wrong! Who, in heaven or on earth, can speak forgiveness for that crime save him who is wronged?

One word about human slavery, and I pass on. Jesus never dared to raise his voice against human slavery, which existed in the most revolting forms about him; and so I leave this part of my subject with these words: If I were a negro, I'd curse this book for the curse it had set upon me; if I were a woman, I'd loathe it for the wrongs it had done me; if I were a tyrant, I'd love it for the help it had given me; but being a man, and white and free, I hold my peace and look forward to the speedy coming of the day when humanity shall lay aside these corks and learn to swim in the pool of life by kicking out honestly and vigorously.

As to his seventh demand for proof that the charities of the world are not essentially Christian, I reply that, far from being even remotely Christian, the charities of the age are purely the bright offspring of glorious science, oftentimes built up in the face of religious opposition. In England, at the present day, there exists a Christian sect whose creed forbids them to administer any medicine to their sick; they content themselves with prayer. I'm happy to add that several of their members hav been punished for their barbarity.

To the mind of Jesus himself, the dumb, the lunatic, the epileptic, etc., were "possessed of evil spirits," whom he often cast out. It may be recollected that he cast seven out of the Magdalene. (Luke viii, 2.) These endeavors of the Jewish teacher to account for the existence of the physical infirmities above named hav cost the world blood, tears, and agony to a frightful measure. Nor are the dread persecutions for witchcraft the only places where Christianity has blackened the pages of human history. If the reader would know what science has been about while Christianity has been counting its beads, repeating its prayers, binding on its amulets, establishing its pilgrimages, let him read the eleventh chapter of "Draper's Conflict "—how, at the touch of the magic wand of science, hospital, asylum, reformatory, laboratory, hav arisen like Aladdin's palace. True, Christians hav given their funds towards the construction of these institutions, but that merely proves the confidence that Christianity has in science.

As regards "homes" and "refuges" for the aged and destitute, China, to-day, can teach us our a, b, c's in matters of filial responsibility, duty to parents, treatment of the aged and infirm. Terrible punishments are meted out to the child who neglects to provide for his aged and infirm parent.

In his eighth demand, Dr. Newman calls for proof that the "criminal classes are excellent and consistent Christians and that their criminality entitles them to heaven." I answer that Jesus entered Paradise in company with a thief, he was followed about by an adulteress, and his disciple Peter was a triple liar. More than this, he associated with, ate with, drank with, notorious sinners. He affirmed that his mission was exclusively to the people of that ilk. The mean, the low, the vile, he loved; the rich, the prosperous, the learned, the influential, he hated; and such an extremist was he on this subject that, in Luke xv, 7, he declared that "there was more joy in heaven over one repentant sinner than over ninety-nine just persons." If this be so, where's the incentive to be honest and pure? At every execution in Christian lands we hav the revolting spectacle of a red-handed murderer bidden "God speed " for the other side by the officiating clergyman.

By inculcating the principle that men can do evil without suffering for it; that the law of "cause and effect" has no place in the moral world; that the natural penalty for wrong-doing may be escaped by a simple operation of the mind termed "repentance," "faith," Christianity turns against the state, makes herself the ally of the criminal, brings contempt upon law and equity, and sets a poisoned dart into the neck of the body politic.

Ninthly, Dr. Newman calls for my evidence "that the superiority and prevalence of virtue in the United States are not directly due to a living Christianity," etc. He shall hav it. The virtue (good morals) of the American people, which we will admit to be a "sublime fact" for the sake of the argument anyway, are due to certain effects resulting from the general diffusion of knowledge, perfect equality before the law, cheapness of the soil, unparalleled material prosperity resulting from absolute freedom of commerce and intercourse among a large number of independent states, with varied climates, products, and necessities. These effects, in their turn, flow from one grand principal cause—the glory of the age—the "bright, particular star" of human enlightenment—the American Constitution and Declaration of Independence. From these instruments Christianity and all other religions were purposely, carefully, absolutely excluded. The fathers of our republic were mainly devout Deists or intelligent Rationalists. I hav searched pretty carefully through the letters of Washington for an acknowledgment of his belief in the divinity of Jesus, and although such may exist, I hav been unable to find it. That Magna Charta of American liberty, the Declaration, appeals to "nature and nature's God" only. The framers of the Constitution, with rare wisdom and noble courage, excluded from that compact every allusion to divinity, savior, prophet, and priest. There is no invocation, no appeal to a God. "We, the people, for the sake of union, justice, tranquillity, defense, and general welfare, establish this Constitution." Prior to the founding of this government, church and state had together laid hands on the people's substance and heels on their necks. The rulers were the "anointed of heaven." All power came from God. The tyrant was the devoutest man in his kingdom. But Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Franklin, Madison, were firmly resolved to exclude religion forever from the state. Jefferson, in a masterly treatise, showed that Christianity is no part of the common law. As chief magistrate he refused to appoint a day of "thanksgiving." Washingington, in reply to a religious deputation suggesting "that some explicit acknowledgment of the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent, be inserted somewhere in the Constitution of the land," replied that what constituted true piety was so plain to the minds of intelligent beings as to stand in need of no aid from politics. So, then, it must be admitted that the Constitution of our republic, being purely a secular one, is in no wise indebted to Christianity or any other religion for the beneficent workings of its provisions.

Now, Doctor Newman claims that the good morals of the American people are directly due to "a living Christianity working through a free church in a free country." In making this assertion he hurls a boomerang, for he forgets that there are other "free lands" in which "free churches" exist. In England, for instance, from whose breast we drew the milk of human liberty, a country as free to-day as our own, there exists alongside of her established church a free evangelical church ; and yet, had our state of New York as large a proportion of criminals as England, she would hav 20,000 instead of 4,000 ! It therefore becomes incumbent upon Dr. Newman to show that American Christianity possesses some peculiar deterrent strength and restraining potency not inherent in the Anglican and English evangelical churches, or seek elsewhere for the cause of good morals in this country.

In his tenth subdivision, Dr. Newman, as a set-off to my list of two hundred derelict clergymen, makes reply that he can giv me a list of lawyers, etc. To this I hav only to say that if Dr. Newman is willing to admit that the "vital force" of a divine system can exert no more restraining effect upon its "consecrated ministers" than conscience and professional honor do upon the lawyer, I am content to burn my list and beg him not to make up his.

I hav now shown Dr. Newman my readiness, nay, my eagerness, to meet him, like a generous foeman, at every point of attack, and hav now again to remind him that his "original proposition" in relation to Freethought and crime still remains without a shred of argument to hide the nakedness of his assertion. ## Geo. R. Wendling.

EXTRACTS FROM A REVIEW OF HIS LECTURE ON INGERSOLL.

"A drowning man grasps at a straw." So is Christianity grasping at the straws that are floating in the stream of human thought. The latest, perhaps, is the New York Observer, which offers one hundred dollars for the best essay written by a theological student refuting the arguments of modern Infidelity. But it is not likely that the "refutation" will be at all sweeping in effect. The best minds in the church hav tried in vain to meet Infidelity; and with the number of clergymen and priests devoting their lives to the work, backed by the thousands of active laymen, if Christianity be true they should be able to completely overwhelm the few Infidels who hav dared to brave public sentiment and proclaim the truth.

George R. Wendling's reply to Ingersoll is a failure in almost every respect. When Ingersoll first took the field as a lecturer the public mistook for mere eloquence of language what was sound logical reasoning, and thought all that was necessary to refute him was an eloquent speaker in defense of Christianity, and were elated with joy when Wendling announced his lecture. Hundreds of such hav heard his lectures and turned away in despair. Wendling is—and as an Illinoisan I speak it with pride—an eloquent speaker; but in his lecture he, either unknowingly or with the characteristic adroitness of a lawyer, violates every known principle of true logic, and even seeks to carry his point by the most malicious falsehoods. In the face of the fact that ninety-nine per cent of the inmates of the prisons of our land are believers in Christianity, that ninety-nine per cent of the murderers punished with death drop "from the gallows into the arms of Jesus," that the bands of men now threatening with fire San Francisco are led by a minister of the gospel, Wendling has the audacity to come before an enlightened audience and, with all the brazen impudence that has characterized Christians for centuries, declare the blame rests with the Infidels.

"By Pittsburgh's conflagration" I can see, not "Ingersoll's legend," but the hand of a pope, who sought to ruin the land he could not rule.

Has Infidelity ever established an Inquisition? or propagated the infernal sentiments of witchcraft?

Wendling says nearly a century ago Ingersoll men ruled France. Ingersoll men never hav ruled France. Infidelity is not Communism. But was that insurrection in France as bad as the Inquisition in Spain? or the religious persecutions that characterized the reigns of Henry II, Francis II, Charles IX, Henry III, Louis XIII, and Louis XIV, in France? Was it worse than the Salem witchcraft of our own land? Was the law of the Commune more tyrannical than the Blue laws of Connecticut? It may sound well in a lecture to say that Christianity and republicanism are inseparable, but the history of past ages does not prove it. Religion sanctions emperors, monarchs, and kings, and teaches the people that it is their duty to obey them.

Freethought is as necessary to republicans as the same is to the light of day. Infidelity sounded the tocsin of a war for liberty in America while Christianity prayed to its God to crush it.

We see Infidelity fighting in the front ranks of patriots, while orthodoxy, in the shape of tories, implored the God of Heaven and the demon of hell to assist them in crushing out freedom.

Christianity would to-day exchange a republic where Freethought ruled, for a monarchy where tinseled despots would propagate their religion by the sword.

Nowhere in history is recorded an instance where the government of state by the church was in the least degree a success.

Furthermore, Wendling says Infidelity has no conscience, and without conscience their can be no commerce. In Italy the relation of the church to state is very intimate. Is commerce fostered with more care or more secure in Italy than the United States, the home of Infidelity?

Is a minister's name, attached to a promissory note, of more consequence to a banker than that of an Infidel? Wendling makes his assertions upon his reputation as a business man. What must men who hav had dealings with the ministry think of his "reputation?" The man who embarks upon the sea of commerce, relying upon the conscience of others, will find himself shipwrecked by the first gale. America is about the only land on earth where men dare express sentiments of Infidelity; yet, I ask, wherei s commerce, both foreign and domestic, more secure than here?

Wendling compares Infidelity and Christianity in death, but looks at the bright side of his picture and the dark side of ours. He asks what comfort there is in death with no resurrection? A resurrection to peace and happiness for all mankind (such as is believed in by many Infidels) would be preferable to no resurrection; but a resurrection to eternal damnation is surely a condition to be dreaded.

One soul condemned to the tortures of the Lutheran hell would mar the joy of a million souls in heaven. Christianity does not promise universal salvation; Infidelity does. The same word which promises life to the faithful also says, "Many shall be called, but few shall be chosen." Wendling asks a parent at the grave of an infant darling to take comfort in Ingersoll's doctrine. We say, No! Take comfort in the theory of infant damnation as taught less than a decade ago by the church. Take comfort in the fact that if Martin Luther's theory be true, your little darling, worth a world to you, is lifting up its tiny voice in an endless hell, and that some day you may look over the walls of the New Jerusalem and with joy see its sufferings, while the jargon of your golden harp drowns its little cry for "a drop of water to cool its burning tongue." There is not a mother in this broad land of ours but would hurl back as an immutable lie the insinuation that there was comfort in Christianity if she believed the curly-haired cherub, which so fondly nestled to her breast, was only to furnish fuel for an endless hell. The only comfort that the Christian mother has is that "Many shall be called, but few shall be chosen." Christianity and the Bible do not teach Universalism, but reason does.

Wendling tells us that Infidelity may do for a philosopher or thoughtful man, but the laboring man must pay the priest and stick to Christianity. Now if Infidelity is good enough for the philosopher and scientist, who are seeking in the front ranks of the reasoners of our age for the truth, why hav the laboring class no right to partake of the fruit of the "tree of knowledge?"

It is a characteristic of Christianity that the masses who support it must never seek the source from whence it comes and whither it will lead, but must follow it with a blind devotion.

Wendling insinuates that as workingmen we hav not the required amount of sense necessary to self-government, but to be honest must liv in dread of a sulphuric hell with a priestcraft to govern us. In this sentiment he unthoughtedly exposes the groundwork of Christianity—that it was originated and is propagated by the priesthood for the power and money there is connected with it. I firmly believe that, as a rule, the workingmen of America hav a higher sense of the moral obligations of man to man than the narrow-minded idiots who are trying to fill the pulpits of our land. Liberty has ever been secured and maintained by the laboring men, while monopolies, capital, and religion hav combined to crush it.

Wendling says Infidelity destroys the home circle and estranges members of the same household. It really does nothing of the kind, but it binds brother to brother, sister to sister, parent to child, and child to parent by the bond of love. But the panorama presented to the Christian is that the son shall rise against the father, the daughter against the mother, and vice versa.

The conflict betwen Ingersoll and Wendling has been fought, but the finale is unlike the one hoped for and prayed for by Christians, and the "Goliah" of Infidelity still towers above the pigmy at his feet that has been styled the "David" of Christianity.

No doubt Wendling seeks by his lecture popularity, but the world to-day has but little sympathy for the man who preaches what he will not practice. Ingersoll preaches charity for all, and practices charity for all; he preaches that death makes all men equal. Wendling preaches that there is to be a distinction beyond the grave; he teaches that Christianity is the thing for the workingman, but not good enough for him.

Christianity was born from the womb of superstition, and has been fostered by the ignorance of succeeding ages. The dawn is breaking, and the glorious sunlight of Freethought is filling with its refulgent rays the land where countless braves are rising up and swearing by the eternal principles of justice that the freedom of speech and of press shall be maintained.

An Opportunity which Should Not Be Overlooked.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Now is the time for the Almighty to perform some of his wondrous works as of old, for the benefit of his "peculiar people." His suffering children in the famine stricken country of Ireland are as devoted as ever were the Jews. They are sorely pressed by their rulers. They are driven from their huts. The last cow is taken from the starving mother and children to satisfy the insatiate greed of the land-owner—the Egyptian. They are to day making brick and furnishing their own straw. Now let the Almighty send his vicegerent from Rome. Let him come to the rescue of his suffering children. Let it rain, not manna but pancakes, honey, and butter, with quails six days in the week and plenty of fish on Friday. Let the people borrow all the gold and jewels from their neighbor, and especially the twenty-five million dollars worth of bonds now held by their queen. Let the land of the oppressors be covered with lice, locusts, and flies. Let St. Patrick return with his toads, snakes, and frogs, and let the rivers of Ireland be turned into good whisky. Let the people hav one grand "wake" over the corpse of their dead liberty. Then let the Pope smite the waters of the Atlantic with the club of St. Peter, and cause them to stand in two perpendicular walls from Ireland to New York. Let the people fil their kneading-troughs with pancakes, honey, and butter, for food on the way. On Friday they can pull fish out of the wall. When all is ready, let the order be given to forward march, and as the people file out let the Pope giv back to them the four hundred thousand dollars that he took from them last year in the way of Peter's pence. If any look back let him be turned into a pillar of gold. The people will take care of the pillar.

Let the transformed rivers of Ireland follow the multitude over the undulating surface of the sea bottom, that "they may drink and forget their poverty, and remember their miseries no more." If there are any righteous Lots among the people, let caves be carved out of the solid walls of the waters on the right hand and on the left for their accommodation, and let little rivulets of whisky follow them into the caves. If there are any Abrahams, let them bring their sisters and hire them to King Anthony for sheep, camels, and asses, especially for asses, as we hav about sixty thousand of them more than we need.

When the people hav come into this happy land of Canaan, let their axes and other tools of iron float on the waters. Let railroads be laid on the surface of the mighty rivers of this great country. It will be much cheaper than the present mode of construction. Let steamboats be run over mountain, desert, and plain, and let balloons descend to the center of the earth. Let the swaddling clothes and right angle triangle linen of the infant of to-day not wear out, but let them increase in size as the infant grows in stature, that when he is forty years old he may wear them in the presence of his children and his children's children.

Let the rod policy of Jacob be brought into requisition, that the products of amalgamation between whites and blacks may be ringed, streaked, and speckled, and the seducer of the maid be photographed on the face of his offspring. Let the works of the Lord wax mighty in the midst of the people, that all may believe and be saved from —what? I don't know. Who does?

Harrisburg (Pa.) Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In conformity with my duty as Secretary of the Local Auxillary Liberal League (145) of Harrisburg, I will inform you of our progress in this neck of the woods. Harrisburg, the capital city of the great Keystone state, as nearly every one knows that has been here, is a town of old fogyism regarding religon; composed of men who believe in persecuting others for not believing that Jonah swallowed the whale; in burning or cutting out people's tongues for not being faithful to the divine creed. Withal, we hav gathered together a band of as brave men and women as the city can produce; men in the first walks of life; of business, of profession; men with the moral courage to demand their rights.

A temporary institution was begun in November of 1879, and on the first Sunday in January, 1880, we adopted a constitution and elected our officers, as follows: President, T. J. Richardson; Secretary, W. H. Keller, Ph. D.; Treasurer, Jacob Tausig; Councillors, Hiram Starr, D. Stevenson, Jr., Michael Dase, and H. Brenaman; Delegates, George Pancake, D. Stevenson, Jr., and D. W. Perry. We hav now a membership of over forty and a handsome hall in which we congregate to hold our debates and exercises, a table well filled with Truth Seeker Tracts, and will shortly be the happy possessors of a book-case filled with Liberal, scientific, and literary works. Thus, you see, we are making splendid progress in the cause of reason.

Notwithstanding the many Liberals in the rear that are holding back because our organization is not as large as the church and has not the influence it affords, we are steadily increasing; and I assure you the time will and must arrive when our little band of braves will be among the strongest organizations of the city.

I shall attempt to keep you informed as to our working from time to time, and hope to receive a cheering word from you.

I remain, respectfully,
W. H. KELLER, Sec.

Comstock's Methods.

A Doctor of Divinity, who is pastor of a large membership in this city, writes to the Health Monthly as follows:

EDITORS HEALTH MONTHLY: I hav read your brave words against the methods of Anthony Comstock and his associates, and congratulate myself on finding some one that voices my own sentiments. I hav frequently denounced to my clerical brethren the anti-vice movement as at present it appears. The fact is, a sort of moral cowardice has overcome and paralyzed many who fear to be unpopular, and hence speak not their mind. I oppose the Jesuitism of this anti-vice movement, for the effort is made to dragoon the whole church into supporting a system of lying espionage. The effort is made to get the money of the benevolent to support a band of oppressive spies. I am not ready for a "paternal" form of government that shall pry into my personal affairs. I do not want it for others. While making laws regulating the mails so as to prevent wicked persons from appealing to the cupidity or weakness of the wicked, and so luring them to their ruin by fraudulent schemes, I want the law so to read that Comstock & Co. cannot, by making a like appeal to the cupidity of the wicked, lure them to their ruin by buying lottery tickets or obscene seeds. Let the lottery craze cure itself like the stock craze. Buying lottery tickets will soon be cured by disappointing results. No need to violate the Constitution of the nation and demoralize public honesty to stop it. No need to go under the form of law and steal all the ready cash in a lottery office, easing public conscience by applying it to feed the poor. Again, no need to hav a young man and his fanatical associates undertaking to say to the respectable families and their physicians: "You hav no right to think for yourselves in the matters of the most sacred bodily concern." "It is obscenity in the family to hav to do with these things." But, O consistency! this Anthony has his curiosity shop! He sends for grave clergymen and others, and, as a vindication of his work, shows them all the worst obscenity of the country. I was invited often to such meetings. I never went except once. Who can stop his show? I hav heard high moralists expatiate upon the pictures and tools on exhibition. But more practically I find scores of women, overburdened with families, dying by inches, and unfitted to care for the children they hav while bringing other weaklings into life to suffer and die.

I hav often thought that I might perform one of the highest services of my profession by sending a physician to these who could tell the mother of a simple way of preserving herself. But I dare not. The doctor dares not. The druggists dare not.

Perhaps for having written this some anti-vice man will attack me. The time has come for protest.

A NEW YORK PASTOR.

W. F. JAMIESON gave six lectures in Frankfort, Mich., nine at Bear Lake; eight at Manistee; is announced for five in Laingsburg, Mich.; and is engaged for a course of five in Garrettsville, Ohio, March 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th. All who wish to secure his lectures should address him immediately at Garrettsville, Ohio.

Liberal League Notes.

THE Liberal League movement appears to be "booming" in all parts of the country, especially in the West and South.

"ANTI-LIBERTY LOGIC," by Elizur Wright, in a recent number of the Index, which will doubtless be republished in THE TRUTH SEEKER, should be read by every one. It don't leave Abbot a plank to stand upon.

MR. W. S. GREEN, of Blooming Grove, Kansas, informs me by last mail: "The blanks you sent me were soon filled with eleven charter members, composed of the best intelligence of the place—merchants, doctors, lawyers, mechanics, farmers, etc. Bro. Lane sends it out to-day accompanied with the money for a charter." Now, is not that business?

DURING the last week the following parties hav applied for blanks and instructions to form Leagues: John Schweitzer, Hepton, Ind.; Willis McDannald, Walla Walla, Washington Ter.; A. B. Armstrong, Ogdensburgh, N. Y.; A. J. Oliver, Jasper, Hamilton county, Fla.; Clayton Crosson, Union Star, Breckenridge county, Ky.; John C. Guthrie, Newburgh, N. Y.; Peter Saispair, Swaburgh, Dodge county, Neb.; Fisher Doherty, Crawfordsville, Ind.

I NOTICE a list of the officers of the National Liberal League, the Platform, and a full list of the local Leagues appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 6th inst. I wish the editor could afford to keep that list standing in the columns. I am sure it would aid the movement. The Board of Directors hav made appointments to fill vacancies that I am sure will meet the approbation of the Liberal public, namely, Mr. J. L. Roberts, editor of Mind and Matter, and Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker, for vice-presidents.

I HAV just cast my eye over THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 6th. It is a most admirable number. What a vast amount of valuable reading matter is contained in it! This paper itself is worth half a year's subscription price. Friends, can't we double its subscription list before the 1st of May, when its brave editor will be again a free man? I think we can. Let every reader resolve to get a new subscriber before another week passes. If you can get one in no other way, subscribe for some half-Liberal friend and make him a present of the paper for a year.

TWO VERY valuable Liberal League publications hav just been issued from the press—an address by the Liberal League State Committee of Missouri to the people of that state, and an address delivered by Hon. U. K. Booth, of Detroit, before the Detroit Liberal League. Both of these publications should be circulated in every community. Every local League should order a hundred copies at least of each. The Missouri address can be obtained of D. Jenkins, Hannibal, Mo. Mr. Booth's valuable speech can be had of S. B. McCracken, Sec. Detroit Liberal League, Detroit, Mich.

FRIENDS everywhere should endeavor to organize their Leagues for a long campaign—for a twenty-five-year war at least. The best auxiliary League constitutions that I hav seen are those of the Cincinnati and Detroit Leagues. The secretary of either League will furnish a copy on application—inclosing ten cents—and also, I think, one of the admirable addresses recently delivered before said Leagues and published in pamphlet form. This is no work of a day, to entirely secularize this government, and therefore this League movement must be made a permanent institution.

WE now hav a good working League in most of the Northern states and in many of the Southern ones. A few yet are behind. I cannot understand why a large and flourishing League is not organized in Chicago. I know that there are hundreds of earnest Liberals there. I wish some reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER would move for organization in that great metropolis of the West. At an early day there was a League formed in Philadelphia, but I hav heard nothing from it recently. If it is dead I wish Bro. Roberts, of Mind and Matter, Dr. R. C. Flower, and others of our friends in that city, would resurrect it or form a new one.

I AM pleased to learn that the Harrisburgh Liberal League is in a prosperous condition. This League was temporarily organized last November, and on the first Sunday of last January it perfected a permanent organization by the election of T. J. Richardson, President; W. H. Keller, Secretary; Jacob Tausig, Treasurer; and Hiram Starr, D. Stevenson, Jr., Michael Dase, and H. Brenamun, Councilors. The League also elected the following delegates to the Fourth Liberal League Congress: T. J. Richardson, W. H. Keller, George Pancake, D. Stevenson, and D. W. Perry. The League has some fifty members, and is constantly increasing in numbers. Well done for Harrisburgh!

THE Detroit Liberal League has issued a call "for a state Convention of Liberalists to be held at an early day for the discussion and advancement of the principles and objects of the Liberal League movement." The officers of the League, in their circular, say, "We take the liberty of expressing the hope that this appeal will meet with a free and prompt response, as it is desirable that the Convention meet at as early a day as practicable, in order that it may make its moral influence felt upon the conventions of the several political parties to be held during the summer, as we believe it will compel from them declarations favorable to the just demands of Liberalism."

MR. CLAYTON CROSSON writes from Union Star, Ky.: "The Liberal cause has advanced wonderfully in this community, as I believe it has in the whole state within the last year. I believe there can be a Liberal League organized here with a goodly number of charter members. We hav already agitated the subject of organizing considerably. There are several earnest persons here in favor of it heart and soul. 'Tis my opinion, Bro. Green, that the whole of Kentucky is ripe for organization, and all that is necessary to set in motion is a few earnest, intelligent Liberal speakers. Col. Ingersoll has the honor of assembling the largest audience ever got together in the city of Louisville."

E. CAMPFIELD writes from Wyandotte, Kan.: "The Second Annual Liberal Encampment will be held at Bismarck Grove, near Lawrence, Kan., Sept. 1st to 7th, inclusive. We want the National Liberal League to meet with us if possible. We want Col. Ingersoll also. The Liberal League movement in this state I know is alive; our people are stirring to obtain the lead in the roll of states, and I feel confident if hard work will secure that position we will attain to it. With but one or two exceptions our Leagues are all alive and doing good work. Kansas is fully committed to all the platform of the National Liberal League, including woman suffrage. We shall begin circulating petitions for the taxation of church property about Oct. 1st, and expect to secure the signatures of fifty thousand voters."

MR. JOHN C. GUTHRIE writes from Newburgh, N. Y.: "I hav offered to giv one dollar a week towards the expense of sustaining a Liberal League here, and there are a number of others who hav promised to giv as much. So I think if you will giv us some advice as to how to organize, there will be no difficulty in forming a Liberal League here. I shall wait for your reply before acting. I should like very much to be put in communication with a few good Liberals for the purpose of interchanging thoughts. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, and I think it improves with every issue. There are seven or eight copies taken here. On my next visit to the city I am going to call at THE TRUTH SEEKER office and invest a few dollars in Truth Seeker Tracts, and shall distribute them where I think they will do the most good. I heartily indorse your sentiments in regard to Liberals working as a unit and not disputing over petty differences." Surely brother Guthrie writes well for a young man of twenty-one years. I wish we had such a young man in every county.

MR. A. J. OLIVER writes from Jasper, Fla.: "I was conversing recently with Hon. Thomas Bell, representative elect to the general assembly of the state of Florida, and was pleased to find him an enthusiastic and outspoken Infidel as well as a most courteous and talented gentleman. I hope you will write to him immediately, tendering him the position of representative of this state on the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, if the position is not already filled. He is a very influential man in Florida, and would be a most suitable appointment to the position in question." Bro. Oliver closes his long and interesting letter in these words: "What say you to the proposition of holding a grand mass meeting of the Liberals in the city of New York on the occasion of D. M. Bennett's liberation, in order that the 'God in the Constitution,' 'God and morality,' 'union of church and state' parties may be assured of the fact that 'we know our rights and dare maintain them, peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must?' We must fight the devil and his imps with fire, with ballots or with bullets, as the case may be, and thus 'make our calling and election sure.'"

Salamanca, N. Y. H. L. GREEN.

Iowa Notes.

ALL persons in this state having petitions for taxation of church property will please forward them at once to their representative or senator at Des Moines.]

MRS. M. M. REED, Cedar Rapids, has been put at the head of the committee in Linn county. Let all secularists in that county at once write her, giving her the names of all outspoken Freethinkers in their neighborhood; also send her stamp for correspondence.

ALL our Liberal Spiritualists in Iowa, as well as other states, should take notice that Mind and Matter, of Philadelphia, has come out squarely in favor of the Liberal League movement, and will hereafter work shoulder to shoulder with THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and Mirror of Progress for equal rights in religion and the secular state. May it wax as the Religio wanes.

W. E. COPELAND, Omaha, Neb., the well-known Liberal lecturer, contemplates taking a trip through the western part of Iowa during April. He wishes to correspond with all parties in that section of the state who think lectures can be arranged for in their towns. Our state is certainly in need of a visitation of lecturers, and I hope that Mr. Copeland will find enough to do, not only during April, but succeeding months. Address him as above.

MR. GILBERT S. BALDWIN, 170 Madison street, Chicago, arrested for selling "Cupid's Yokes," has been bound over in $1,250 bonds for trial this month. It now remains to be seen whether there is more justice for Liberals in the West than there is in the East. Mr. Baldwin's only offense appears to be that he is publishing a cheap edition of Ingersoll's and Paine's writings. This is the animus of all these persecutions; "obscenity" is simply gull's seed thrown to catch the unwary. There is not, as these inquisitors well know, a single obscene or indecent word in this much persecuted pamphlet; it is equally pure in hue and word with H. W. Boozer's "Stubborn Facts," Trall's "Sexual Physiology," and other well-known works. Let us push the circulation of petitions calling for repeal of the unconstitutional and invasive postal law. Never mind the howls and groans of the sanctified and purified Paul Prys. True virtue thrives only in the atmosphere of perfect freedom.

E. C. WALKER.

Letters from Friends.

INNERKIP, ONT., CAN., Mar. 1, 1880.

DEAR EDITOR: In reading your paper I never fail to look if there are any letters from Canada; but it is seldom that one appears. As an evidence that this is not altogether the fault of friends, I know a very warm friend of Bennett's (James Brown, of Galt) who, two or three months ago, sent a letter for publication containing $13.00, $10.00 of which was for the Defense Fund, but as yet no acknowledgment has been made in the THE TRUTH SEEKER, and although there is no complaint, I would merely suggest that it would be better if a more frequent acknowledgment of moneys was made.

I am glad to see that your business is increasing, and that you are adding to your stock of excellent books. I hav lately read the "Martyrdom of Man," by Winwood Reade, and look upon it as one of the most fascinating, instructive, and entertaining books I ever read. It is certainly a very valuable addition and should have a large sale.

From what I can learn, Freethought is spreading very fast in this country. I very seldom hear a sermon, but I hear that the preachers are giving Infidelity a large amount of attention. Scientific thought is compelling many of the most learned to admit that the first chapters in Genesis are allegorical, and not historically true. Now, it is not very long ago since the Rev. Mr. Taylor, author of the "Devil's Pulpit," was imprisoned for showing that the Bible, from first to last, was an astronomical allegory. Surely the world moves. By and by we will be told the meaning of the flood story, that of the ass speaking, the sun standing still, the whale swallowing Jonah, etc. Thousands of intelligent and well-meaning people laugh at these stories, as legends of a barbarous age, and the clergy hardly know what to do about it.

Bennett's last letter is rich—one of the best he ever wrote, except that brief, bold, independent, and pithy one to the President. That, I believe, will be read when nearly all others are forgotten. The idea of an honest, noble-minded man standing in the penitentiary upon his dignity and innocence, withdrawing the appeal of himself and friends for the clemency of the President, is grand.

It appears a good many, led by such men as Underwood, regard THE TRUTH SEEKER as rough and uncultured. Well, why can't that class read their polished and cultured sheet, and allow the uneducated and unpolished the luxury of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER? John Bunyan says: "One loves the meat, another loves to pick the bone." Evidently the readers of your paper are satisfied with the great hunks of meat doled out to them weekly, and they should be willing to allow others to polish the bone, if they so desire.

For some time after taking your paper I filed the numbers away, thinking them well worth keeping; but I found the weekly bill of fare so ample that I did not need the old numbers, and therefore began to giv them away; the result has been several new subscribers.

In conclusion I would say that so far as I know all are in sympathy with D. M. Bennett, and look upon him as a very badly-abused man. Yours for truth and right,

F. MALCOLM.

[Our friend's donation was received, and will be found acknowledged in another column. We like to wait till we get a big list.—ED. T. S.]

OURAY, COL., Feb. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As a Liberal and a friend to the downtrodden and oppressed, I wish to associate my name with the many who sympathize with you, bereft of your freedom, which is the elixir of life, the foundation of all true happiness in man's existence.

We reason, we advocate free press and free speech; to do good and be happy is our belief, and for this the world "shuts its door in our faces and empties its slops upon us from the windows." For an expression of our ideas the heretic robs us of our liberty and calls upon his God to banish us to a den of devils, there to writhe in torments forever, and through all eternity to feast upon the vapors of an eternal hell. We must die and yet exist. We must forever be dead to enjoyment, yet alive to suffering. We must be made to suffer the pangs of death, followed by the tortures of eternal damnation, that the wrath of a loving God may be appeased. Not satisfied with the tortures inflicted by their God, they will giv us a foretaste of a future punishment in the form of a prison (an earthly hell), instigated and governed by the imps of heresy, who possess the spirit yet lack the power to administer the sulphurous flame. While you are serving your term in a heretic's dungeon, the victim of unjust accusations, a Rev. Hayden allures a fair one to destruction, and, fearing exposure, robs her of her life that his own character may be preserved, and he is a free man.

An incident occurred in our vicinity a short time ago which I hope may find a place in the columns of your paper. A person, calling himself by name A. F. Kibby, and residing in Brooklyn, made his appearance in one of our little rural districts advertising himself as a superintendent of one of the largest Sunday-schools in Brooklyn, N. Y., a great church man, and the president of a mining company. He borrowed a horse to ride a short distance, disposed of it, returned in a roundabout way to Ouray, became beastly intoxicated, and was told by the peaceful citizens of the place that his presence was no longer necessary. Fearing that the farmer of whom he borrowed the horse might become uneasy and overtake him, he departs, post haste, for his home, his church, and Sunday-school, imagining his sin will not find him. He is a fraud, and the people are anxious to expose him, even in his own city.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is regularly received and its contents eagerly and attentively perused.

We are thankful that in our isolated yet picturesque valley, under the shadow of the old "Rockies," we can receive an occasional glimpse from "Behind the Bars," and unsparingly the sunshine of your thought casts its rays abroad to lighten our pathway. Yours truly,

CHAS. S. TRENCHARD.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I learn from a reliable member of the most wealthy and aristocratic church (Presbyterian) in Oswego city that it is next to impossible to support their minister and defray their absolutely necessary expenses—they are getting so skeptical. He says also that this is the case with all the other Protestant churches there, and every regular attendant is expected to inclose all he can spare every Sunday and drop it on the plate. One church is closed, and on a board over the door, in large letters, are the words, "For sale." I should think God would come to the rescue, but he only "laughs at their calamity."

Yours truly, A. H. W.

HONEY GROVE, TEXAS, Feb. 17, 1880.

DEAR BENNETT: Perhaps this is the last letter I shall ever write with your name at the head. Will you indulge me to say that I never headed with a nobler name, although I ventured once to giv this heading, to wit, "His Excellency, Rutherford B. Hayes?" But, O God (or devil; whichever you please), how he has disgraced my favorite name! I did not ask the moral coward to release you from prison; I did not ask him to pardon you, for I held that you had not sinned in the case. Well, perhaps we should rather pity than despise a moral coward. Who knows his physiological surroundings? He is what they made him.

Bro. Bennett, I sometimes feel a little overplumb and imagine that your name will liv as long as that of Socrates. I think I told you once that nothing hurts if you don't care for it. And now I say, don't care about things so much as to induce derangement or insanity. Your mind is worth $1,000,000 to the world after all the bad luck you think has overtaken you. I shall not be surprised, if you liv for twenty-five years to come, to know you will feel that Comstock, Benedict, and Hayes should be pitied on account of their low state. Truth is rising and must conquer.

Brother, I hav no doubt that I am in my second childhood. Perhaps I hav already said uncouth things in this letter, though I'll not fret about it if I hav, for I write for you and you only, and you will hav to excuse me. Perhaps you hav learned long ago that I was born in 1799. I am now called "the old Infidel." I don't think any of my acquaintances expect me to turn Christian. I hav had my Infidel creed published in two newspapers in Texas. In that creed I declared that I had once been a zealous Methodist and once been a respectable Presbyterian, and that I yet believe I got as good religion when I was fourteen years of age as any person ever did get. The truth is, I am constitutionally a very religious man.

But I must now break off from my experience and tell you what I began this letter for. I want you to find one dollar within and send me all the leaflets you can afford for that dollar. Of course I shall distribute them gratis. Please make the selection for me.

I hold that I am a good man, but I cannot keep from getting mad while I am reading "From Behind the Bars." As old as I am, I feel that I would travel a thousand miles to get Benedict, Colgate, and Comstock into the penitentiary for ninety-nine years. The book says, "Love your enemies," but I hold that it is impossible. I hold that we should not injure our enemies unjustly; but these three scamps that I hav named deserve the ninety-nine years if they should liv so long.

I see that you expect to breathe fresh air about the first of May. Millions of people will be glad when you enjoy that glorious boon. Let us both try to liv till that day, that we may rejoice together. You will be 61 years, 4 months, 8 weeks; I will be 81 years, 3 months.

Farewell, farewell, J. A. RUTHERFORD.

[The following letter should hav appeared earlier, but has been unintentionally overlooked.—ED. T. S.]

SARANAC, MICH., Jan. 5, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With the commencement of the new year we presume it not inappropriate to acquaint you, as well as our surrounding brother Liberals, of the progress that we as co-workers, unsupported by any extraordinary ability and influence, and while yet young in experience and unable to announce, sincerely desiring it may in a measure be the result of stimulating into action any inactive organization where services and assistance in their national great and glorious reformation of Christian tyrannicalism is now so decidedly solicited. That there is indeed much work for all to so accomplish much, but a reflection to measure the vastness of the outstretched field before them, yet with the fond recollection of our merited endeavors in the near future encourages and accomplishes results that once looked insurmountable. Within our small surroundings of about one thousand individuals, situated beneath the towering monuments of five Christian obeisances, we are permitted to subscribe the sentiments of one hundred and fifty patriots loyal to the principles of universal liberty and the unjust usurpation of its rights by Christian intolerators who would trample beneath respect the independence once so heroically battled for, and since so fervently cherished by their admirers, who now stand arrayed sustaining the noble efforts, if it can be so honorably achieved and left to be guarded.

As we look back upon the old year, and bid a farewell to its fleeting remembrances we are pleased to receive with much gratification the satisfactory result that favored our energetic endeavor granting to that divine book an unlimited vacation whose services in our public school hav by theology so long been taught as a necessary adjunct usurping an uninterrupted possession for years. But to-day, this day, the dawn of a new era recognizes for once an independent free school where untutored intellects are not subnascent to a Christian creed utilizing the attention that nature's abundant beauties more intellectually educate and instruct. Strenuously did our religious usurpers oppose this just, equitable, and impartial demand. Reluctantly accepting the wish and will of those who hav become cognizant of the impartiality and injustice to humanity and civilization, evidently conceiving an approaching evil that sooner or later perchance was destined to ripen to a complete abrogation of those Liberal principles that our time-honored fathers ordained as a universal enjoyment.

And now, with a more popular, improved Liberal sentiment a League was deemed advisable, that more and better accomplishments might be secured, and, in pursuant, called into favorable consideration the attention of fifty freemen, who felt the encroachments upon their rights, and, in adjudication, subscribed in obedience to the Liberal platform their support and influence as the only thoroughfare that grants to them those privileges.

Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine, as a year indelibly marked in the history of Liberalism, we could not refrain from leaving a memorative landmark sacred to its fleeting remembrance, and an opportunity more favorable was made unquestionable by the appreciative presence of brother J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, the eloquent and energetic Hercules of Liberal thought and eloquence, whose forcible and unanswerable arguments carry conviction to the willing listener. Kindly giving us a course of five lectures, an average audience greeted him on Sunday morning, December 27th, in his first lecture entitled "The Destructionists—Who are They?" In the evening his lecture, "Are we Indebted to Christianity for our Civilization?" was attentively listened to by a large and appreciative audience. Monday evening his subject, "Does the Universe Disclose Design?" brought forth again another full house. It was a masterly effort, with telling effect. Tuesday evening came, and, as usual, a good audience honored his well-delivered discourse upon "Liberalism—Its Aims and Designs;" at the close of which a League—No. 129—was organized, enrolling about fifty members, all of whom heartily indorsed the Cincinnati platform, and elected for their president Mr. S. L. Shaw, with S. M. Crawford as secretary. Wednesday evening—New Year's eve—closed the series of lectures, with a continuation of Monday evening's lecture, embracing Evolution. A sociable party, largely attended, after the lecture, closed a most enjoyable and successful entertainment, and one long to be remembered.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I think it not inappropriate to state that THE TRUTH SEEKER'S circulation, by our encouragement, has increased within the last year about thirty copies in this little place, which we think well done when we remember hardly one copy was taken before that time.

Respectfully yours, S. M. CRAWFORD,

BOONTON, N. J., March 5, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: There is no doubt any longer that it is determined to destroy the Liberals, by all means, fair or foul. The mask is thrown off. A man here told me that Robert Ingersoll, and all like him, were worthy of death. He said that is what many more said. Put to death is the verdict. Mark that down. Mr. Bennett should be thankful his life is spared. Yours, LEWIS HAWGENSEN.

AUBRY, KAN., Feb. 16, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT. Dear Sir: My brother in Liberalism, if I hav not forfeited the right to that claim, I at last forward the amount due you on your paper. I hav been so negligent that I am really ashamed to write to you, but all I can do is to own up to it, and if I am forgiven this time I shall certainly try and do better in the future. I often wonder that you could be so lenient with me as to not stop sending your paper to me. I am truly grateful and happy that you hav not done so. I believe I am the only person in this vicinity who takes it. I hav tried hard to get some subscribers in this neighborhood, but our doctrine is not popular here by any means. I hav been told by some that the paper was not fit to be in any man's house who had any regard for his family. To such I would say that this is claimed to be a free country, which I however think is not, and I hav a right to my religious and political views, and shall express them as strong as my intellectual powers will admit me to whenever called upon to do so by an opposition party. Myself and family hav many a time been ridiculed for believing in truth. THE TRUTH SEEKER is my bible, and with it I hav been able not only to combat, but also to defeat any arguments the Christians may bring up on religion. I often feel thankful that I ever came across its path, and that of its noble editor. Hoping that it will continue to liv and prosper, I remain,

Yours truly, ALFRED COLLINS.

LITCHFIELD, ILL., Feb. 25, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hope you will pardon my neglect to send on pay for the best paper in this country. I take six papers, but I would sooner hav THE TRUTH SEEKER than all of them.

I hope our venerable friend, D. M. Bennett, will come out in good health and spirits at the end of his term of imprisonment; then he will pay them up for old and new. Inclosed you will find post-office order for $9, to be applied as directed. Yours truly, W. J. CYRUS.

SUGAR LOAF, COL.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find money order for eleven dollars. And in connection with this small amount of money I want credit for a large amount of sympathy for one who suffers for daring to exercise the rights of an American citizen. May your confinement be short from the exercise of a power delegated to the President of our country.

I differ with your religious views; but, like you and thousands of others in our great country, I insist on unbounded freedom of religious expression by word, press, and mail.

Can't something be said or done that will break down a manifest temerity in a great number of Freethinkers? Freethought is trammeled by fear of public opinion.

Yours in friendship, JOHN S. COLBY.

JOHNSON'S CREEK, N. Y., Feb. 26 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Though I hav been for over fifteen years a believer in Freethought, and hav done what I could in a manner more or less private to substitute the philosophy of a rational religion for the tenets of the church in the minds of those with whom I came in contact, it is only since I became a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I hav become aware of the extent and perfection of the system of power of the Christian churches for the purpose of crushing and persecuting Freethought and Freethinkers, the effect of which is seen in the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett, the brave and fearless champion of human rights.

For the introduction of THE TRUTH SEEKER into our family, and into that of several others in this vicinity, we are indebted to the presence and efforts in our midst of Mrs. Amelia Colby and Mrs. Olive Smith, of St. Louis, Mo., who are doing truly valiant work in the cause of Spiritualism and Liberal thought both in Johnson's Creek and in Lockport.

Mrs. Colby has delivered five lectures here, and she has so clearly set forth the falsities of church, the parasitical nature of the priesthood, the encroachments of the whole Christian system on our once free government, its wily and dastardly manipulations of our laws to silence and persecute Freethought and Freethinkers under the pretense of protecting our land from the immoralities of obscene literature, that the community has become roused as never before.

Large audiences hav listened eagerly to her fearless and forcible speeches, and masterly arguments, with thrilling interest, while the church looked threateningly on, feeling itself supported by no truth that it could demonstrate, no fact on which to rest as a basis, hav used their only weapons against her, malice and falsehood, and to which they would gladly add torture, and are only hindered by the existing Liberal public sentiment.

In closing I would say to either Liberal or Spiritual societies, if you desire a speaker in your midst who will not only disseminate Freethought, but who will rouse its advocates to life and action in the much needed work of reform and Liberalism, you cannot do better than to avail yourselves of the services of Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, who are about to visit the Eastern cities, and who will answer any calls on their route thither. EMMA TAYLOR.

DOCTOR FELLOWS

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

It is self-evident that a physician who, like Dr. F. P. Fellows, pays special attention to a certain class of diseases, and treating thousands annually, acquires great skill. Physicians knowing this fact recommend persons to his care. Consultations personally or by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

HIS PRIVATE CIRCULAR

Sent to any address, giving full information in regard to his External Application, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill. Inclose two three-cent stamps and address as above.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER writes: "Mr. Slenker has been under his (Dr. Fellow's) care for some months; is being treated by him for partial deafness and chronic catarrh, both of which infirmities seem gradually yielding to the doctor's remedies. There is no warmer friend to progress and mental freedom among all the readers of our beloved TRUTH SEEKER than good Dr. Fellows, and if you are afflicted with any of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to, I hope you will one and all give our Liberal friend an opportunity to make you well again—to render the physical casket a fit receptacle for the jewel of the mind, which is THE ALL that makes us what we are and renders us worthy of the love, admiration, and respect of our kind."

Freethinkers' Badge Pin.

The cut shows the design and size of the badge, but not its beauty. The whole badge is intended to signify symbolically that the "world moves," and that "universal mental liberty" is being spread over the world by the "leaves of learning." Badges made of heavy gold plate; price of single badge, package registered and postage paid, $1.25. Club of one dozen or more, ordered to one address, package registered and postage paid, $1.10 each. Remit by P. O. order or registered letter. For fractional parts of a dollar, postage stamps of the denomination of one, three, and ten cents taken. Orders filled in the order of their application. Badges to be had only from the patentee, LUCY L. CHURCHILL,
West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus "let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

Revelations of Antichrist

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The book contains 446 pages, with a very full Index and table of contents. Price, $200.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $2.00.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

Assyria, Sir H. Rawlinson, Layard; India, Max Muller, Webber; Persia, Heerens' Asiatic Nations; Central Asia, Burnes, Wolff, Vambery; Arabia, Niebuhr, Caussin de Perceval, Sprenger, Deutsch, Muir, Burckhardt, Burton, Palgrave: Palestine, Dean Stanley, Renan, Dollinger, Spinoza, Robinson, Neander.

Greece, Grote, O. Meller, Curtius, Heerens, Lewes, Taine, About, Becker's Charicles; Rome, Gibbon, Macaulay, Becker's Gallus; Dark Ages, Hallam, Guizot, Robertson, Prescott, Irving; Philosophy of History, Herder, Buckle, Comte, Lecky, Mill, Draper; Science, Darwin, Lyell, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Vestiges of Creation, Wallace, Tylor, Lubbock.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.50.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 300 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Kelm, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

YOUR confirmed novel reader has a holy horror of second perusals, and would rather read any trash for the first time than "Pendennis" or "Pride and Prejudice" for the second.—Pattison.

WHILE thought is ever advancing it is the nature of institutions to fix the mental states of particular times, and there hence arises a tendency to conflict between growing ideas and the external arrangements which are designed to express and embody them.—Youmans.

WHEN young and sanguine I published certain essays on human rights, in which I remember to hav argued in favor of their natural origin; and among other things I maintained that a man had a legal right to be a fool, since nature made him so, but that society could not afford to allow him to be a knave, however nature may hav abused him; and now that I am old I see no reason to depart from that doctrine.—Hon. E. P. Hurlbut.

WE hav convinced ourselves by this time that a man may be a sage in celestial physics and a poor creature in the purchase of seed-corn, or even in theorizing about the affections; that he may be a mere fumbler in physiology, and yet show a keen insight into human motives; that he may seem the "poor Poll" of the company in conversation, and yet write with some humorous vigor. It is not true that a man's intellectual power is like the strength of a timber beam to be measured by its weakest point.—Eliot.

FOR many years it has been one of my constant regrets that no schoolmaster of mine had a knowledge of natural history, so far at least as to hav taught me the grasses that grow by the wayside, and the little winged and wingless neighbors that are continually meeting me with a salutation that I cannot answer, as things are. Why didn't somebody teach me the constellations too, and make me at home in the starry heavens, which are always overhead, and which I don't half know to this day?—Carlyle.

WHO can blame me if I cherish the belief that the world is still young, that there are great possibilities in store for it, that the Englishman of to-day is made of as good stuff and has as high and independent avocation to fulfill as had the ancient Greek or Roman? While thankfully accepting what antiquity has to offer, let us never forget that the present century has just as good a right to its forms of thought and methods of culture as any former centuries had to theirs, and that the same sources of power are open to us to-day as were ever open to humanity in any age of the world.—Tyndall.

THE investigation of truth, as in theory it is universally acknowledged, demands perfect composure of mind and the absence of all disturbing passions. But is it possible for a writer who does not flatter popular notions in divinity to obtain many readers in that state of mind? Can a man who calls upon people urging their duty to examine their religious notions and to take the necessary trouble for separating truth from error, avoid giving offense? No. The strongest tendency of the human mind in respect to religion is to save itself trouble, either by embracing a superstitious and indiscriminate system of belief, or by dismissing the subject as totally unworthy of attention.—White.

GENESIS I.: II.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petition is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibly directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays,

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

BEECHER calls over-piety "heavenly drunkenness;" and he knows.

THE question is asked, Can the Pope's debts be called roman-tick?

IS THERE any one so unгallant as to object to a second term for Mrs. Hayes?—Herald.

PARIS streets are being supplied with illuminated pneumatic clocks, all driven from a central station.

WINSLOW, the sanctimonious Boston forger, has turned up under an assumed name in Buenos Ayres, where he has married again, is publishing a newspaper, and making addresses to Sunday-schools.

IN the poorest quarter of Rome, three weeks ago, a crowd of famishing workmen stopped a cart load of bread, and in a twinkling carried all off. Here is another opportunity for sympathetic newspaper proprietors.

COL. INGERSOLL says that he cannot understand why Cowley should be sent to jail for starving a few children while the Christian God starves a whole nation. Ingersoll is away behind on this. Has he not read that whom God loveth he chasteneth? Just now the Irish appear to be particularly favored.—Truth.

THERE were no services in the Baptist church at West Pawlet, Vt., on the evening of March 7th, because, as the pastor said, "it was so muddy." Wonder if mud affects the operations of the devil very much? The Lord must hav been sorely disappointed in not hearing from them that night. But we presume he was not much displeased, as he has not struck anybody with lightning, and he shoved the sun up Monday morning at the usual time. Do those Baptists suppose the Lord will postpone the Resurrection day on account of mud?

ALBERT DUMAR, thirty years of age, who says he is employed by the Newark Bible Society, to distribute tracts, was arrested a few days since in Brooklyn and taken before Justice Courtney, on a charge of stealing ten dollars' worth of books from Mrs. Amelia Zoller, of Hall street. The accused had a clerical appearance, as he was dressed in a black suit, and wore a white neck-tie. Mrs. Zoller swore he was the thief, and he denied it, and offered a bundle of tracts as evidence of his good character. The accused was committed to jail until the justice can make inquiries concerning him.

THERE is a deal of religion in the world which is not very unlike the German, of whom we heard the other day. When he went to the registrar's office he was asked, "Are you a Protestant?" and he replied, "No, sir." He was asked again, "Are you Catholic, then?" and he once more replied, "No, sir." "Then, of course, you must be a Lutheran," was the last question, and the Teuton, somewhat puzzled, answered, "Well, if I am anything I am Lutheran. Now I think of it, I believe I inherited something of the kind on the mother's side."

MR. BEECHER took ground yesterday in favor of taxing church property as other property is taxed. It is a long while since the Eagle held that to exempt a church is, in effect, to force the community to support it. Every Jew and Infidel is compelled to assist in paying for the church that does not pay its own share of the taxes. In principle there is no difference between this system and the direct maintenance of an established church out of the public treasury. Churches are in the nature of luxuries, which those who enjoy ought to pay for.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE Evansville Journal tells these two stories: "Col. Ingersoll, while walking in front of the hotel yesterday, was approached by 'Rooster,' the cross-eyed little newsboy, who is about two feet high and a most forlorn looking little fellow. 'Take a paper, sir?' he said, holding up one to the gigantic pagan, 'take a paper, sir? All about Ingersoll.' 'Ingersoll,' said the Colonel, 'what's Ingersoll been doing?' 'I dunno, sir,' said Rooster, hopelessly, 'but something orful, I expect,' The Colonel took the paper and gave the astonished boy seventy-five cents as a reward for his unconscious humor. While in the city, Col. Ingersoll met some old acquaintances from Shawneetown and began inquiring of others. Among them was an honest old woman, who supported herself at the wash-tub 'And she's washing yet, you say?' asked the Colonel, 'Yes, but she's getting rather old and feeble to keep it up much longer.' When Mr. Bowman, of Shawneetown, went home he carried fifty dollars in his pocket as a present from Col. Ingersoll to the old washerwoman. It's worth paying a man like that $600 a night if he spends it all in this manner."

THE recent release of John Brown Smith from the jail in Belchertown, Mass., will not be a great surprise to those who saw in it a hopeless contest on the part of the town against Mr. Smith, in which it must ultimately giv way. It has been proved that the poll-tax is not collectible in the same sense as an ordinary debt, if the citizen chooses to resist its payment, or if he has not the property with which to satisfy the tax collector. But Mr. Smith was not imprisoned so much because he declined to pay over his $2,00 bill to the Belchertown collector as because of his radical views on our social system. His was a case of outrageous persecution, the collector disobeying the instructions of the district-attorney and failing to attach property so that he might satisfy his personal prejudices and dislikes. It is rather an expensive lesson for a small borough like Belchertown to learn, and we are inclined to think she won't be anxious to repeat it again very soon. The Journal has made Mr. Smith's case its own, since his imprisonment, so far as his opposition to the poll-tax was concerned, and it views his release with no small degree of triumph and satisfaction.—Hampshire County Journal.

CLERICAL ERRORS.

Ten recent incidents of "clerical error" may be briefly summarized:

Ten little parsons, preaching love divine,
One kissed his servant girl, then there were nine.

Nine little parsons, preaching sinners' fate,
One kissed his neighbor's wife, then there were eight.

Eight little parsons, smoothing paths to heaven,
One kissed his boarding-mistress, then there were seven.

Seven little parsons, exposing Satan's tricks,
One starved the children, then there were six.

Six little parsons, preaching Christ alive,
One got slinging arsenic, then there were five.

Five little parsons, preaching, sin no more,
One shot his sexton, then there were four.

Four little parsons, preaching Calvary,
One got horsewhipped, then there were three.

Three little parsons, preaching Christ as true,
One cut his baby's throat, then there were two.

Two little parsons, following the son,
One beat his child to death, then there was one.

One little parson, just for pious fun,
Eloped with a deacon's wife, then there was none.—Brooklyn Eagle.

IT seems a little odd that no biography or biographical sketch has been written of James Parton, the most noted of American biographers. Personally, he is so very retiring, he goes so little into society, that he is hardly known outside of his books. A native of England (he was born in Canterbury under the shadow of the famous cathedral), he is of French Huguenot descent, one of his ancestors, Pierre Parton, having crossed the Channel and settled in Kent. All the Partons hav been men of the people, farmers or millers, with plain, simple ways, and a tendency to Liberal opinions. The biographer lost his father when he was six years old, and at that tender age came to this country, living most of the time in or near this city until he removed recently to Newburyport, Massachusetts, now his permanent home. He was very poor in his youth, but got a very fair education, with much trouble, and at seventeen taught a private school for six or seven years. He had always had a fancy for writing, and after awhile was engaged on the Home Journal at ten dollars a week by N. P. Willis. His first book was the "Life of Horace Greeley," which sold forty thousand copies, and established his reputation and the line of his talents. He has published more than a dozen works, all of which hav been very popular. On the "Life of Voltaire," which he has substantially completed, he has been engaged twenty years. It has been a labor of love, and he thinks it by all odds his best production. He says that an industrious and capable writer can just exist—no more; that by a compromise, not dishonorable, but exasperating, he can, during his best years, earn $7,000 or $8,000 a year (very few authors hav ever been able to do this in America), but that no man should adopt literature as a profession unless he has a fortune or can liv comfortably on $2,000 a year. Parton prepares his books with the greatest care and painstaking. He spends far more time in collecting his material than in putting it into form. In doing his "Life of Greeley," he traveled through New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, and Pennsylvania to gather incidents of his early youth. So with the "Life of Jackson." He visited every place where Jackson had lived, beginning in the cellar of the house in which his hero had been born. He works regularly and by system; writing from 8 A.M. to 1 P.M., then dining, and taking exercise in the afternoon. Later he reads and examines authorities, but puts away all his tools after dark. For twenty-five years—he is now fifty-seven—he has been one of the most indefatigable and conscientious members of the literary guild, having always refused to do any kind of work which he deemed unworthy merely for temporary notoriety or pecuniary gain.—Times.

MR. STUART ROBSON in the Detroit Free Press defends his profession against the attacks of a clergyman of that city who impugned the morality of actors and actresses. He gets back on the clerical gentleman in a rather severe manner: "The Rev. A. T. Pierson, in his attack on the stage, is quoted as saying that 'the green room of the theater is often no better than the infamous third circle that in some theaters opens directly into the house of shame.' Is it not time for the clergy to stop their misrepresentations of a profession whose moral record, by actual statistics, is far superior to their own? If there is reason for supposing that the door of the theater opens into the house of shame, is there not stronger reason for supposing that doors of many churches possess the same questionable qualities if we may judge by the large percentage of clerical scoundrels who use them? If we are known by our fruits, how do the actor and preacher stand before the law of God and man? There is scarcely a prison in this country or Europe that does not contain 'members of the cloth.' Some are imprisoned for theft, many for murder, but the principal occupation of these unfortunate gentlemen seems to hav been the destruction of homes and the betrayal of innocence, though the greater number of these criminals escape legal punishment through the holy horror that many clerical bodies hav of 'an exposure.' Not that they desire to shield Brother Chadband, oh, no! but if it were known, 'scandal would be brought on the church.' It was this policy which saved the Reverend Kalloch in Boston some years ago from the church's condemnation, but the tax-paying, law-loving citizens were less forgiving, and this pious scoundrel, who denounced the theater as a house of shame, was forced to fly from a city which he had disgraced. The last Sunday-school speech made by that reverend rascal, Cowley, the pious glutton, who has been systematically starving poor little children, was a warning against the sinfulness of the play house. Persons of this class heartily indorse the Reverend Pierson's view of the stage. In this connection it may not be amiss to say that I challenge the Reverend Pierson to name a single state prison which numbers among its inmates an actor, and I will contribute $100 to the Irish famine fund if he can name a single state prison that does not hold a preacher. In conclusion, if the Reverend Pierson really believes that the influences of the stage are so demoralizing, and the teachings of the pulpit so elevating, how does he account for the small percentage of convicted crime among the players, and the very large percentage of convicted crime among the clergy? The pulpit has been thundering against the stage for 5,000 years, and yet it lives. As intelligences advance the strength of the drama increases. The preacher Calvin denounced it as a "covenant with hell;" the player Shakspere immortalized it as the "beloved of heaven." The bigoted wickedness of the preacher has caused the world much suffering. The beautiful character and inspired works of the player hav left an influence for good which will endure to the end of time."

What Is Liberalism?

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE WAYLAND (N. Y.) LIBERAL LEAGUE, DEC. 4, 1879, BY G. W. MOREHOUSE.

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: The question, "What is Liberalism? What are its uses, aims, and probable action and influence?" is beginning to be asked. The time has come for Liberals to freely express their views, that people may better understand and appreciate the principles and objects of our organization. It is easy and natural for wagon-wheels and men to keep in old ruts. The pioneers in any great undertaking have hard work to clear away useless obstructions. Most men are naturally timid and conservative, holding fast to the old and tried, even long after it has been found wanting, and after newer and better ways have been discovered by the pioneers of thought and of action. Liberalism points to a little-used road, and declares that it is incomparably safer and better than any of the old highways, and that it demonstrates facts and recognizes principles that are sure, in practice, to vastly improve the condition of mankind. Although it is easy enough for the Liberal to prove that he stands firmly upon the rock of truth, and that his intolerant opponents stand trembling with apprehension upon the shifting sands ef error, yet all real advance must be gradual, and every true friend of mental freedom will learn to be patient and to tolerate all conflicting views, however absurd and pernicious they may be.

Liberalism makes war on no man's creed. It is willing that every man should enjoy the right to his own belief, and to worship or not worship, according to the dictates of his own conscience. It is ready to defend the rights of any persons, even those of its most bitter opponents. The primary object for which the National Liberal League has been organized is to secure to ourselves the same rights that we so freely concede to others. Our opponents have unfortunately inherited, through the ignorant and intolerant centuries, the habit of claiming unjust and unfair exemptions and privileges, and the still more dangerous practice of visiting upon the heads of those who presume to wander aside from the old ruts into the beautiful and instructive byways of nature and of reason, persecution more or less pronounced, political and social ostracism, and opprobrious epithets. Liberalism means progress and fair play. Its principles are as deep as the human mind can fathom. Its field of labor is co-extensive with the planet on which we live.

The first great practical object of the Liberal organization is, in the language of Article II, of the Constitution of the National Liberal League, adopted at the organization of the League, at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, "to accomplish the total separation of church and state, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuine morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood in all human life, may be established, protected, and perpetuated." This principle of the complete secularization of our government in all its functions, and throughout all its various branches, really covers all that Liberals expect to accomplish through civil government. This we have a right to work for; this we have the right to demand.

Ever since the formation of our national government it has been the boast of our citizens that here was the home of personal, political, and religious liberty. In the palmy days of human slavery, when nearly one-eighth of the population of the country were held, and bought, and sold, as personal property, this country was proclaimed from the platform and the pulpit to be the land of liberty. Inconsistent as such talk appears to us now, the man who laughed at it then was called a fanatic, and many other hard names. Now we are told by our political and clerical orators that we are enjoying perfect religious liberty; and Mr. R. B. Hayes, in his last Thanksgiving proclamation, tells us that "civil and religious freedom have gladdened the hearts of our people" during the past year; and, continuing, speaks of this country as "the habitation of liberty and justice." Again history repeats itself, and there are none, except the Liberals, to point to the inconsistency and injustice of the statements; and they are met, as before, with that old weapon—which is the last resort of those without argument—of calling names.

Now, one of the best ways to show what Liberalism is is to show what it opposes. I shall, therefore, attempt a necessarily limited inquiry into the question as to what sort of religious liberty and equality we are now enjoying, and see if our orators and officers are justified in lulling the people into the slumber of indifference by such statements as we have referred to.

For the sake of the argument, we will say that I am a Presbyterian and you are Methodists. Is it religious equality and justice, is it in accordance with the spirit of our national Constitution, is it right and fair, that we Presbyterians should have our church property and our ministers exempt from taxation, while the property of you Methodists is not exempt, and you, therefore, have to bear more than your proportion of the burdens of government? You have to pay for governmental protection for yourselves and us too, we going scot-free. Is it fair thus to throw a double burden on you? is it manly on our part to shirk, in this manner, our portion of the public duties, and take what we have not paid for? This is the unenviable position in which all the Christian churches are found to-day. They accept the exemption of their church property, and their ministers, up to a certain amount, from their part of the implied governmental contract, holding the government to its part of the contract to afford protection to their property and person; and other religionists, non-religionists, scientific apparatus, and lecture halls, and all other kinds of property, are taxed at a higher per cent to make good the deficiency. It has been estimated that at the present time there are some $500,000,000 of church property exempt from taxation in the United States. Now, the Liberals want to stop this leak, tax all property alike, put all sects and religions, philosophies and sciences, on an equal footing, letting "nobody dance only those who are willing to help pay the fiddler." Is it not a virtual confession of weakness, of inability to stand alone, for any organization to accept or secure exemption from its fair share of the burdens of government? Liberals would scorn any proposition to accept any special privileges at the expense of others. All we ask and all we will take—and we will not willingly take less—is fair play—an equal chance with the rest of the citizens of this great republic.

Another wrong that Liberals oppose is the introduction into our public schools of any form of sectarian or religious instruction. This is contrary to the fundamental law of the land, and is also a misappropriation of public funds, collected alike from Jew and Gentile. Our common schools are designed to give our children a knowledge of the elementary branches, to give them the tools with which they may carve out for themselves a higher education; to teach them how to learn, that they may become good, intelligent, and useful citizens.

Religious instruction may be properly had at home, in parochial schools, and at church, and cannot be had at public expense, and at the same time secure the perfect separation of state and church necessary to prevent those gradual and insidious encroachments that have so often heretofore in the world's history deprived people of their dear-bought and cherished liberty. There is nothing truer than the saying, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." What would be thought of either political party if, having the power to do so, it should introduce its platform and speeches into the schools for the purpose of gaining recruits, or on any other pretext? Why, sir, it would be very politely led out of the door by the nape of the neck. This would also be the fate of direct denominational interference. In guarding this great citadel of human rights the sentinels on the ramparts must watch closely, for there are myriads of indirect approaches, and even now our liberties are being undermined and impaired little by little.

So active and zealous is this religious and sectarian propagandism beyond its legitimate sphere, in schools, in our legislative halls, in public prisons, in the army and navy—everywhere where secular government should be permitted to rule alone, everywhere using the people's money and the people's time—that it would seem as though they were fearful that there might be a lapse of memory and habit, long enough to permit the dawn of doubt and reason.

Liberals are also opposed to Sabbatarian laws, and demand their abrogation. We want no man's rights interfered with; we want no one molested; we want every person left free to worship; we want good order enforced. We do not propose to interfere with the pulpit, but we do demand the right to engage in intellectual and recreative pursuits on Sunday without being law-breakers, and without being stigmatized as Sabbath-breakers. We claim that it is the natural and inalienable right of every person to do as he pleases on any day of the week, provided, however, he does not in any way interfere with any one else. Every man should have the right to enjoy himself and use his time, according to the promptings of his own conscience, if that conscience of his is sufficiently cultivated to keep him from molesting his neighbors. We want the individual cultivated and improved. The motto is, "Individualism." Give each man an equal chance. No old Blue laws, no penning up and tying down this living, growing, progressing human organism; no making every man toe the same chalk-line, no cutting out the suit and then fitting the man to it; but let every person worship, rest, and recreate in a hall with or without the steeple, in the green fields or by the health-giving and beautiful lake or seaside, on the mountain or in the forest, in the house circle or out among the sweet-scented and lovely flowers; let him enjoy nature's bountiful feast spread all over this ornate globe, and reaching out in every direction into the infinite expanse of the starry heavens. In fact, gentlemen, we want to breathe free. On the one hand, we do not hanker after the puritanical Sabbath, and on the other we do not care to accept as the best attainable the continental European Sunday. But this American people, a mixture of all races and creeds, want as many different kinds of Sunday observance as there are different notions on the subject, with legislation to protect all alike and favor none.

Laws forbidding lectures, entertainments, public expositions, and pleasure trips on days when men are not at work, encourage idleness, and idleness is the parent of mischief and crime. It is often the case that working men and business men are unable to leave their work or business except on Sunday, and it is a special injustice to them to deprive them of the only opportunity they have to seek healthful and invigorating recreation. Of course the strict old Blue-law observance of the Sabbath would fall more lightly on a class of men who earn their living on that day, and have all the rest of the week to enjoy themselves in any way they may desire. May the time soon come when every man and every creed will stand equal before the law.

The Liberal League demands further the "cessation of all appropriations of public funds for religious instructions, or religious purposes of any kind." If time is money, the wasting of the people's time in public fasts, festivals, holidays, Sabbaths (taking for such purposes in a lifetime of three-score years and ten, more than ten years), would come under this head, and should cease. A single appropriation of time or money for the benefit of any church or religion makes to that extent that church or religion a state church or religion. The state has invested that much for that purpose, and indicated a preference. That such action is a violation of the doctrine of total separation of state and church is evident, and extended argument is unnecessary. Many appropriations and privileges that it would be impossible to obtain directly for such purposes are got through our legislative bodies indirectly. One of the favorite methods is to help the great work of education by voting a benefit to some institution of learning, and it turns out in the majority of cases that such school is run in the interest of some religious denomination. So the state is indirectly aiding religious propagandism, and that to influence young minds that ought in reason to be left free from bias until time and culture have matured the judgment. It is the first duty of every patriotic citizen to so act, and so vote, as to prevent any further appropriations of this character.

The League favors the "substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath." Last September, during the trial of a criminal case in Nashville, a man named John H. Dixon was ruled out as a witness by the presiding judge because of his religio-scientific belief. He stated among other things that he believed in the Darwinian theory of evolution, which is now accepted by nearly all scientific men. Indeed, Prof. Marsh, than whom there is no better authority, in an address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, referring "to the unanimity of scientists upon this theory," said, that "to doubt evolution to-day was to doubt science, and science was only another name for truth." It is a poor compliment to men in this age of the world to doubt their truthfulness unless they are influenced by fear of some dire punishment in the misty future. There are men who seek the truth and tell the truth because it is the truth, and not through fear. There are men who, without pay and at great expense, devote the best portion of their lives to the discovery of absolute, demonstrable truth, encountering persecution from the interested, and sneers from the ignorant. Are they to be discredited as witnesses because their habits of investigation have taught them to require much evidence, and because their perfect love of truth has cast out all fear? It would seem that that period in the enlightenment and evolution of mankind had now been reached in which it would be safe to give every man an equal chance. Belief in any particular theological standard does not make men truthful, and, on the other hand, disbelief does not necessarily make them liars. The causes that go to form the character of the man lie deeper than this.

The League is in favor of the freedom of the mails, irrespective of the political or scientific character of the literature sent; but is utterly opposed to the dissemination, through the mails or in any other way, of obscene literature. It has become necessary for the League to define its position upon this point, for the reason that interested parties have unjustly, maliciously, and wilfully claimed to the contrary. The charge has been made in such a way as to lead any fair-minded man, who has taken pains to investigate the case, to the irresistible conclusion that the real object of the calumniators is to prevent the circulation of arguments and facts upon religious, philosophical, or social questions that do not happen to accord with their own notions. These gentlemen are perfectly willing that everybody should enjoy the right to think as they do themselves. They are ready and willing to think for all mankind, and this is what they call political and religious liberty. When they practice the precept of Confucius, "Do not unto others as ye would not that others should do unto you," paraphrased in the Golden Rule of the gospel, then and not until then, will liberty make America her home. The motto of the Liberals is the essence of liberty: "Accord to all others every right we claim for ourselves."

We ask for simple justice, one of the objects to establish which the Constitution of the United States was made. How justice is now meted out to those who disagree with the ruling classes, and are therefore presumed by them to be wrong, is well illustrated in the case of Mr. D. M. Bennett. Let me say right here that there is no liberty where men are not protected in their right to be on the wrong side of any question, and to maintain their position freely by argument. D. M. Bennett is a Freethinker, and is the publisher of a paper in New York city, called THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is also the publisher of numerous books and pamphlets, such as the writings of Professor Newman, R. G. Ingersoll, Thomas Paine, Voltaire, and Underwood. It is part of his business to sell books of like character not published or printed by himself. He is furthermore the author of several books and tracts on kindred subjects. This business he had the right to carry on in a free country, and, with just administration of the laws, could not be punished. He is an earnest, energetic man, and his business grew rapidly. The Society for the Suppression of Vice, organized ostensibly for a good purpose, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, soon marked him for their victim. From their point of view his business was pernicious, and they wanted it stopped. In 1877, their agent, Anthony Comstock, procured the indictment of Mr. Bennett, and made thorough search of his stock of books. Only two pamphlets were found which, "by hook or crook," could be made to appear objectionable; but on the works being shown to the Department of Justice, at Washington, the case was ordered to be dropped, for the reason that the books were not deemed unmailable under the United States postal law, designed to prevent the mailing of corrupting literature. Agent Comstock, thus balked in his effort at religious persecution, swore vengeance, and kept a sharp watch on the doings of Bennett, hoping to entrap him. His opportunity occurred in the case of a small pamphlet, called "Cupid's Yokes," a book written by Mr. Heywood, and neither printed nor published by Bennett. This was in November, 1878. The Attorney-General of the United States, in speaking of the dull, unwise, short-sighted, but not obscene, book, "Cupid's Yokes," said: "While it seems to me a publication not desirable to be made, I am aware that there may be much difference of opinion upon the subject, and do not confound it with those obscene publications, the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions." This is the opinion of any fair man, competent to judge. But Mr. Bennett must be crippled. He had, as I think, unwisely sold the pamphlet, and sent it by mail, claiming he did not agree with its author, but sent it to vindicate the right of any one to mail such a book. Comstock got him indicted, and in due time he was brought to trial before Judge Benedict, of the United States Circuit Court. A more one-sided and unjust substitute for a trial has not been seen since the Star Chamber proceedings, or the criminal trials of the infamous Judge Jefferies. Bennett was not allowed to prove innocent intention; not allowed to introduce the book, so it could be judged of by its general scope; not allowed to bring authors and publishers to show how it ought to be classed; not allowed to show that it was purer than books that are standard, and found in every household, but was condemned on a few detached passages in the book, principally quotations from standard works, and was only allowed to prove his good moral character. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $300 and be imprisoned at hard labor for thirteen months in the Albany Penitentiary, where the old man (upwards of sixty years old), with his hair and whiskers trimmed off, and dressed in prison garb, is now working out his sentence. An avalanche of petitions, containing nearly 200,000 names, was sent to President Hayes for his pardon—for the pardon of a man who had committed no crime; but Hayes declined to interfere, and there is one loyal heart, thanks to Mr. or Mrs. Hayes, now beating its life away in Albany Penitentiary that "civil or religious liberty has not gladdened" (to repeat the language of the Thanksgiving proclamation). And this is freedom in the best country on the globe in the last quarter of the nineteenth century of the Christian era. An old man taken away from his business and friends, shut up with criminals, and compelled to learn a new trade; thirteen months of the remaining few years of his natural life wrested from him by the strong and cruel hand of power. And why is it done? Simply and solely because he is D. M. Bennett, and dares to let the wide world know the fact. And this is justice!

The degree of civilization of any people may be known by the manner in which they treat their women. From a condition of servitude and mere merchandise, subject to barter as other property, as is the custom among the more barbarous tribes, women have risen until, in this country, they stand higher than anywhere else on the globe; but still, even here, they are the vassals of the stronger sex. Women who require protection in person, and in thousands of cases in property, are not permitted a voice in making the laws by which they are governed and supposed to be protected. They are taxed without representation; certainly a gross injustice. They are more intelligent to-day, in spite of their more limited chances, than many who exercise the right of elective franchise. Their very presence brings to every place a purer atmosphere. They may—God knows no one else can—purify the corrupt and stinking cesspool of party politics. I, for one, fully indorse the proposition of the Liberals to tender to them the ballot, which, of right, belongs to them, and invite them to undertake the job. Uncle Sam's old house needs cleaning, and many an ancient cobweb awaits the new broom.

The Liberals have placed a plank in their platform covering the question of intelligent suffrage. In a republic, where all power is vested in the people, it is evident the masses of the people must be honest and intelligent to successfully run the intricate machinery of government.

Recognizing the danger arising from ignorance, the most prosperous states of our nation have provided public schools for the education of the future citizens of the republic. In some sections of the country this precautionary measure has been and is neglected. Some of them have no provisions made for, or at least possess most crude and inadequate means of, education.

The Liberals propose to amend the Constitution of the United States, requiring each state "to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education." When this is accomplished, it is proposed to make "universal education the basis of universal suffrage."

To successfully maintain for the generations to come a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," we must have higher standards of intelligence, honor, and morality. To this end we must educate. A little learning, with all due deference to authority, is not a dangerous thing, but more is better. It is not possible to get too much. Education will improve the individual; make him a better and more useful citizen; give him a more humane feeling toward other citizens and a better appreciation of them and their peculiarities, and will tend to remove discord and sectional bitterness and help to make us a united, prosperous, and contented people. We should inculcate breadth of view and charity toward all.

There are other reforms that are pressing. Practical measures are needed to secure equal civil and religious rights to every person.

Justice ought to be administed in such a way as to make it cheap—cheap enough so the poor man can obtain his rights and afford to maintain them. The present system, in its working, is unnecessarily expensive. To bring about the best attainable result, a new factor must be brought into politics, and that new factor is conscience. The salvation of the country demands it. There must be no privileged classes. Men must have the courage of their best convictions of duty. Let oppression and stealing cease.

The conscience party of the future will receive the active support of every true Liberal. It takes no prophet to foretell that the time will come when the Liberals, like the old Abolitionists, will be a power in the land, and a power for good. We will stand fearlessly upon principles, unmoved by unpopularity or momentary failure. In our keeping is the hope of the future. Our principles are as true as fate and as enduring as the granite that underlies the solid earth on which we stand. Ignore the principles the Liberals advocate and the doom of individual liberty is sealed. Every man and woman must be allowed to think for themselves. There must be absolutely no aristocracy of thought.

The mission of Liberalism is not to tear down and destroy, but to build greater and better than those who thoughtlessly follow the waning ideas of a less enlightened age have ever thought or dreamed. We well understand that the task we have undertaken is no light one. We fully recognize the great strength of the powerful organization arrayed against us, but we have one bright ray of faith to cheer us on—faith in the truth; truth, tested by doubt, based on evidence, and rooted and grounded in the unchangeable laws of nature. We believe that truth cannot injure, but is safer for every man, woman, and child than any form of error, however flattering and seductive it may appear. And believing this, we steadfastly believe in its ultimate triumph. The evolution of the human race will turn the defeat of to-day into a glorious victory in the brighter time to come; and, in the beautiful language of the poet, Bryant,

"Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among his worshipers."

The Doctrine of the Predominance of Law.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A much esteemed contributor to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER recently made the statement that "religion never was and never can be a matter of the reason, but of the emotions." I infer from the above remark that the writer thereof believes that the human reason is infallible in itself and that it is not dependent upon premises to govern its conclusions.

Now, wrong premises will lead the human reason to wrong conclusions, and under this head religion can be a matter of reason as well as anything else. It was not emotional, it was rational, for the orthodox religionists to say, in the words of the "New Hampshire Confession," that "the wicked will be sentenced to suffer eternally in hell on principles of righteousness;" it is reasoning from the false premises that "man, by voluntary transgression, fell from a holy and happy state, and that all the evil he now commits is not from constraint, but choice."

The emotion in religionists is caused by the conscious reasonableness of their claims. A doctrine consciously reasonable from certain premises is the cause of all the emotionalism in every system, political or religious.

Another much esteemed writer to THE TRUTH SEEKER, in order to meet the demand of the times, advocates the "supplanting of a religion by a religion."

Now, no new system can be introduced without a reasonable foundation to build upon; and as reason is dependent upon premises to lead it to a conclusion, true premises are first in order. There must always be some authoritative basis for action, so that the people who are about to take a new departure can do so confidently.

Before Luther dissented from the church of Rome the pope was, chiefly, the supreme authority for doctrine throughout Christendom. Luther gave the people the Bible, which he reasoned and claimed was the infallible word of God and the only authority by which their reason must be governed. At the present time no real unity of action among Liberals can be secured without some fundamental authoritative standard is set up to lead their reason to right conclusions.

We hav outgrown the doctrine of Bible infallibility, and the question forcibly comes to us, What is greater than the Bible? The answer is obvious, and we must admit it as Rationalists, that if there is any authoritative standard which ought to govern the Liberals of this age, that authoritative standard is science. It is safe to supplant the Bible by science, for science can never destroy the truths of the Bible, but will verify them if there are any there. As the Bible doctrine of justification by faith led Luther to contend for individual liberty of conscience, the scientific doctrine that all matter and phenomena are subject to the power of universal law ought to lead all men to grant one another the inalienable right of being true to the principles of individual differentiated organization. If Luther could logically preach justification in individual belief by faith, scientists can logically preach justification in dissenting from the superstitions of this age by the doctrine of the predominance of law in nature. Harmony is the condition which we seek, but it need not be secured at the price of individual hypocrisy. Each individual has a vision peculiar to himself, so let the doctrine of the predominance of law in nature invoke charity from the heart of every differentiated human organization. Yours for the truth,

Minneapolis, Minn., Feb. 29, 1880. JOHN MADDOCK.

Pulling Down Without Building Up.

Says Lecky, in his "History of European Morals," vol. I, page 53:

"Among the many wise sayings which antiquity ascribed to Pythagoras, few are more remarkable than his division of virtue into two distinct branches—to be truthful, and to do good."

And in a note Mr. Lecky adds:

"The opposite view in England is continually expressed in the saying, 'You should never pull down an opinion until you hav something to put in its place,' which can only mean, if you are convinced that some religious or other hypothesis is false, you are morally bound to repress your conviction until you hav discovered positive affirmations or explanations as unqualified and consolatory as those you hav destroyed."

I commend the above to those who think that "an organ of pure negation" is not needed and maintain that "a religion can only be supplanted by a religion." ANTICHRIST.

If Not Material, What Is It?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I wish to notice a few points in an article by William J. Gorsuch, also wish to notice M. Babcock. Both articles appeared in your issue of March 6th. I desire in this article to lead our Materialistic friends out of a mistaken idea which they seem to hav fallen into in regard to matter and spirit. I believe that Spiritualists should not say that man is a spirit, as a wrong idea seems to be conveyed thereby. We are often asked by Materialists if spirit is immaterial. I cannot conceive of an immaterial something, hence say that spirit is matter in a more refined condition than matter we see and handle.

The writer is a Spiritualist because he can't help it, and has had many lively arguments with Materialists; and though they generally sneer at Spiritualism and think that those who advocate it are a little soft on top of the head or hav a disordered stomach, yet we love the Materialists; they are laboring to free humanity; thus far we are in the same boat and are working for the same grand, noble purpose, and we can afford to take their sneers and jeers good-naturedly, as we are in advance of them so far as evidence of a continuation of life beyond the grave is concerned. Yes, we are ahead on that score.

A certain musty old book says, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth;" and we wish to chasten our Materialistic friends quite sharply. They do not believe in orthodox faith, and pride themselves on going on facts. Yes, they are a matter-of-fact set of fellows; no assertions for them; they want the facts; scientific facts, if you please. We are compelled to say that Materialists, as a class, whom we hav talked with, make more assertions upon the point of future existence, in the same length of time, than any other class we hav talked with. They say life is the result of organization. How do they know? They say when the body dies the man ceases to be a living entity. How do they know? They say life beyond the grave is past finding out and belongs to the unknowable. How do they know? They say we hav had no evidence of a future life. How do they know? They say we are mistaken, deceived, and that it is all imagination. How do they know? Tables and pianos hav been raised to the ceiling, and they say electricity does it. They can't say, with Charles Beecher, it's the devil, for they don't believe in his satanic majesty. They say it is odic force, electricity. If a few sitting around a table with their hands on it will bring in the aid of electricity so that it is moved about or lifted up, it is strange that people hav not learned ere this that when a building is to be moved all that is necessary is to get a few men to put their hands on it and away it goes to the desired spot. Heavy logs could be taken to the mill. Odic force does it. Well, they know about as much about that as the rest of us—simply nothing.

It will soon be thirty-two years since the tiny rap was heard at Hydeville, New York, in the presence of those two young, innocent girls of the Fox family, and all the scientists of the Materialistic school, all put together and boiled down, the very quintessence of their wisdom, hav failed to tell us what produces it. I say it is done by intelligences who once lived in a physical body as we are now, and they say it is not. How do they know? They simply don't know. How do we know? We know by its being demonstrated to us. We say the future life cannot be reasoned in or out. It can be known only by being demonstrated. Our orthodox friends believe they will liv hereafter; our Materialistic friends think they won't. One class is just as well off as the other. It is belief with both. Only when the Materialist gets pretty well cornered he will say he knows we won't liv hereafter, when, in fact, he knows no such thing. The orthodox backs up his position with fact and belief; the Materialist backs up his by a huge pile of assertions.

Now, since we hav got into this, please be patient and follow us through, for we wish now to say something about soul, spirit, and matter, as they are usually termed. We intend to be very careful now, for we are aware we shall get into deeper water than old Noah was in when sailing in that skiff.

We accept the Epicurean philosophy—the atomic theory. We believe that every atom that entered into the organization of this planet, or that floats through the universe, contains life and motion. We claim matter, motion, and life to be co-existent and co-eternal. We believe the atom contains all the intelligence it needs for its condition. We believe that each atom contains an unevolved immortal principle (soul if you like), which always has and always will exist; hence the life-principle, or soul, always has and always will be a living independent entity, and that we can no more lose our identity than we can cease to breathe without doing violence to a law of our being. We believe each and every soul, mind, or intellect has traveled through all the kingdoms below, traveled up through organisms adapted to its then developed condition until the genus homo is reached. We cannot conceive of intelligence existing entirely outside and independent of organization. This idea, to our mind, does away with a great central intelligence whom Freethinkers are pleased to call God. We cannot conceive how intelligence can manifest itself without brains. If we hav not traveled up through various kingdoms and organizations, how did we get here? Come, my Materialistic friend, you say life is the result of organization. Will you please tell us when life entered into the human organization? Was it at the moment of conception, or at the time of birth when the first breath was drawn? Please tell us at what stage of fœtal development the life principle entered the human organism, and tell us the door it got in at. Where was this intelligence, and how came it there? If, as Tyndall says, matter does it all, then mind, intellect, soul, or life principle must be subservient to matter; and, if so, what is it that is moving physical organisms? A dead physical body can't move, yet it is all there intact. We say the life principle, or soul, which has evoluted from the atom has left the coarser, outer physical body and still exists in a finer physical body, generally termed spirit.

Now we wish to notice our friend Babcock. He asks of what use is a soul. He says: "The body says, I'll go into a saloon and get drunk. The soul says, I'll go with you." He further asks, "Which is it that's drunk—the body or soul?" He might as well ask, Of what use is man, this planet, the universe, or anything else? We think the soul is the man dwelling in a very fine physical body, and both incased in a gross physical body, which is tangible to the senses. We might compare our two bodies and the soul to the hickory nut, which has a coarse outside shell and a finer one within, and the germ, the life principle (the soul, if you please), incased within the finer shell.

He asks of what use is the soul. Of what use is the body without the soul? Of what use is a corpse? There is the body, and you might drive it full of tacks, and it don't flinch. What's the matter with friend Babcock? There is the body, but the something that would hav been hurt by the tacks is not there. We should say the soul was drunk as we never yet saw a corpse go into a saloon and get drunk. Did you? We deny that the body says, I'll go into a saloon and get drunk. Did you ever hear a corpse talk? Why, he asks, does not the soul keep the body from committing sin? Could you keep the wind and rain from beating through the cracks of an old log hut? The soul, the man, is no doubt subject to its conditions and surroundings, hence a man can't be a free moral agent. The engineer may hav plenty of number one steam on hand to run a locomotive fifty miles an hour, but if it is defective it may not be able to drive it ten miles an hour. Which think you is at fault—the steam or the defective machine? The physical body from our standpoint is but a machine, and if pre-natal conditions were brought to bear, which produced a defective machine, the soul is in no wise to blame.

Good-bye, Mr. Babcock, we must now look after our friend Gorsuch a little further. He asks, What room hav we for spirit, since force cannot exist apart from matter? Here he mistakes what seems to us to be the true idea. As we hav said, the spirit is not the man, but a finer organism which he dwells in when he goes into finer conditions in the future. We say yes, spirit, so-called, is really refined matter, and is subject to natural laws, which in no wise disproves life beyond the grave. We deny that mind, intellect, or soul are functions of the brain. We claim rather that the brain is but the machine by which the mind or soul manifests itself. Of course, destroy the brain and the mind is gone. What business has the man there when the machine is of no use to him? If you should rent your pants in pieces, so they would be of no use to you, you would get yourself out of them. He says that nature's laws demonstrate that when a man dies his existence as a personality ceases. Friend Gorsuch, you hav asserted something which you are ill-prepared to prove. In fact, our Materialistic friends cannot prove their assertions, neither can they disprove the claims of Spiritualists. He objects because we accept human testimony. We do not accept the testimony of any one. We accept the facts as demonstrated to us, through our senses. If we can't determine a thing by the sense of sight, feeling, and hearing, all brought to bear at the same time, then of what use are our senses? We do not admit as our friend says, that tricksters can do the same thing. We say, with due respect to our friend, that when he or others assert that Spiritualists hav not had the evidence of life beyond, all such show a degree of egotism not warranted by the candid-thinking mind. What, tell me I hav not had evidence of a life beyond? Pray, how did you come in possession of such a remarkable degree of wisdom?

We will conclude by saying that unless our Materialistic friends can tell what produces the tiny rap, the independent slate writings, or the spirit picture, and many other phenomena which never hav been duplicated, and which we challenge any one to do in the gross physical body, they had better hold their peace. You matter-of-fact men, who want everything demonstrated, will please demonstrate that man does not hav a conscious existence beyond the grave. Please disprove Spiritualism before you assert that it belongs among the "forgotten dreams of the dead past." Spiritualism has been clearly, fairly, and squarely demonstrated to tens of thousands of candid, honest, thinking, and reasoning men and women of brains, with keen perception and broad comprehension, yet our friend seems to think it impossible for others to hav anything demonstrated to them which has not been demonstrated to him.

Kersey Graves' Alleged Inaccuracies.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Kersey Graves agrees to forfeit $500 to any one who shall succeed in finding in any of the corrected editions of his works "one error or important statement not corroborated by reliable historical authority." The Cincinnati Gazette of Jan. 16, 1880, contained a long review of his works, in which numerous important and glaring errors are pointed out and proved beyond a possible doubt.

On looking at the list of Biblical contradictions in Mr. Graves' "Bible of Bibles," numbered 1 to 234 inclusive, I was struck with the apparent variation of many of the quotations from the original texts. So I took the trouble to compare the first few, and I found out of forty-eight texts or parts of texts quoted, that thirty were verbally incorrect, and these I believe are fair examples of the whole. This, it seems to me, is not a very good showing for one who challenges the detection of a single error in any of his works.

State Teachers' Association, Iowa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hope you and your readers will pardon the seeming egotism of this self-introduction into your columns. I am forty-five years old, and hav a wife and nine children, of whom the eldest two are teaching in the public schools of this state. I myself followed the same avocation until increasing deafness disqualified me for a proper discharge of the duties of the school-room. My better half has also been a teacher. We all hold first-grade certificates. This much I giv as a personal excuse for speaking particularly of the State Teachers' Association, which met at Independence, Iowa, Dec. 29, 1879. Besides being, as is usual with such assemblages, a "mutual admiration society," it did the usual amount of praying and singing. R. Saunderson, of Burlington, was elected President for the ensuing year, to the credit of the Association be it said, by a minority vote. (Is not this minority business getting to be rather monotonous?)

The President elect then delivered his inaugural. His opening sentence in a eulogy of the dead was, "The stream of time is endless." Then John's angel committed perjury when he swore (Rev. x, 6) that "there should be time no longer." I am afraid, my dear Mr. Saunderson, you hav done worse than the teacher who contradicted Moses. You hav had the audacity to impeach an angel, "Issuing from the fiat of omnipotence, it pursues its onward course till it has run the boundless circle of eternity." There I think the angel scores a point against you; for if time is made by a "fiat," cannot a fiat end it? Oh, how convenient it is to hav a God, for then we know all about things that we don't know anything about without! If it were not for that "fiat" now we should just hav no time at all, and the beardless boy would be as old as his father or grandfather. Then people would hav to work by the job instead of the day or month. Othello's occupation would be gone with the watch and clock-makers'. The sun would hav no time to rise and set, but would simply do it by job, bobbing up and down like a sawyer in a stream. Teachers could not teach by the month, but would contract to fill up so many pupils with so many parts of science and so many parts of religion. To be sure we would need some new inventions, the pedaometer and theometer, to gauge the pupils, in order to ascertain if the teacher has performed the contract; but then, what else could we do with our watch and clock-makers?

After paying his compliments to the dead, the president next proceeds to fusillade the living, and especially to demolish the Kindergarten Messenger and New Education, because the editor "cannot believe in anything that does not manifest itself to the senses."

"Such an education," he continues, "may find congenial soil and air in the kindergartens of Milwaukee and Detroit, but I think you will agree with me in saying that it will find poor foothold in the fair prairies of Iowa." He no doubt thinks he has said something very severe about Milwaukee and Detroit.

Let all the godly Lots of the modern Sodom and Gomorrah take notice from this warning angel and at once flee to the fair prairies of Iowa. But if they still persist in remaining there and being burnt up, President R. Saunderson has at least done his duty as soon as he could from an official standpoint.

He wants the children "to be taught to practice the precepts of the Decalogue," and also "to reverence the hand that wrote them." Iowa religionists will certainly be opposed to the worship of the Holy Hand or any other innovation. If the president thinks to rival the Catholic's Sacred Heart with the Protestant's Holy Hand he will be disappointed. But he would hav the practice of the Decalogue taught. How about keeping the Sabbath? Many of my neighbors are Seventh-day Adventists, and hold to the Decalogue more tenaciously than the self-styled orthodox Protestants.

And how about the Jews, the original custodians of that same Decalogue? Ah, my dear Mr. President, it is very little religion you can teach "and not giv offense to the conscience of any one." This is very thin deception, Mr. President. You mean war to Freethought. In your imagination you hav hoisted your banner inscribed "God," and formed the triple alliance of Catholics, Protestants, and Jews to extirpate Atheism. But, my dear Mr. President, you will never succeed. You will quarrel among yourselves about the nature of your God before you hav ever given the heretical Infidels a blow.

You tell us that away up in the skylight of the New York Post-office the sleepless eye of a watchman overlooks the many employés below, and prevents them from stealing. So you "would place on the walls of every schoolhouse in our land, in golden letters, that a child might read them, 'Thou, God, seest me.'" So I presume you will hav the Sleepless Eye as well as the Holy Hand as emblems to worship in your new religion. Excuse my inquisitiveness, Does an honest man need watching?

But the inaugural is such a jewel, I must now quote a whole paragraph: "It is said that a principal of a graded school in one of the towns of our state was in the habit of using language in the presence of his classes like the following: 'Old Moses said so and so, but I think differently.' You will, I am sure, agree with me in saying that the citizens of that town did right when, at the end of the year, they protested against his re-appointment. Ingersolism should hav no place in our schools." Why, yes, they were very patient to wait till the end of the year, which indicates that there must hav been something of the generous air of Milwaukee and Detroit about the place that God's elect did not at once drive him away to the splash of rotten eggs. Well, they waited patiently (I know all about it) because they had to wait, and at the end of the year they installed a pulpit-pounder in his place to undo the evil that he had done. (I giv no names, Mr. President, as you gave none, and if you wish it may pass as a pleasant fiction.)

Well, before the end of his year he prudently left in order to avoid certain new responsibilities in connection with two of his more advanced female pupils. He had appealed to the same Sleepless Eye and Holy Hand as to the purity of his sentiments and the fidelity of his intentions. He made able prayers and sang sweet hymns, and talked about the "fiat" of God—but he ran away all the same for all that. He was a "meek" man, and never, absolutely never, pretended to know more than Moses; and after his flight, in order to avoid pursuit, like Moses, he wrote an account of his own death and sent it to his victims. Now since you, Mr. President, did not giv the name of my brother, I shall withhold the name of yours, and perhaps it would be pleasanter to all the parties now to say no more about it.

You say: "There is a prominent teacher in one of our Western counties who givs each winter a series of public lectures in his schoolhouse, the object of which is, to quote his own words, the uprooting of Christianity, with its gods, Christs, Holy Ghosts, and other superstitions. Fortunately there are few such cases, for were they the rule rather than the rare exception, public instruction would die a speedy death and its funeral would be attended by but few mourners." You are under a mistake. Catholics may take their children from our free schools because priests do not control them, but Protestants as a mass are only prevented by a few self-constituted leaders from according to Liberals the same toleration and liberty they demand for themselves.

Walnut, Iowa, March 1, 1880. J. K. P. Baker.

Liberal League Notes.

Liberals of New York state, now is the time to circulate petitions in favor of taxation of church property. Ask your member of assembly to vote for Hon. Charles S. Baker's bill when it comes up.

The address recently issued by the Missouri Liberal League State Committee can be obtained of D. Jenkins, Hannibal, Mo., for two dollars per hundred copies. Every League should order a hundred copies at least.

Liberals in the various towns and cities of the United States and Canada who take a New York paper through their news agent should order Truth. This is the most Liberal daily paper ever issued at the metropolis. Every Liberal should thank Truth for the way it is showing up that Christian fraud Comstock.

I thankfully acknowledge the following contributions, made since December 14, 1879, to aid me in my Liberal League work: Mr. Cowles, $1; John Barrett Beel, $1; Thomas Goddard, $1; B. F. Babbit, $1; Nelson S. Fowler, $1; A. H. Pike, $1; no name, 75 cents. I desire to call the attention of the reader to the continuation of this subject in a short article in this number, entitled, "To the Friends of the Liberal League Movement."

During the past week the following persons hav ordered blanks and instructions to form Leagues: G. L. Clark, Valley Grove, Neb.; Wm. L. Worley, Pescadero, Cal.; D. P. Wilcox, Yankton, Dak.; A. Whiting, Melissa, Tex.; Wm. Butterfield, Silverdale, Kan. The Board of Directors hav just issued a new instruction pamphlet, much superior to any one heretofore published, that will be furnished to any one desiring to form an auxiliary League.

E. Campfield writes: "Our camp-meeting will be held at Bismarck Grove, Sept. 1–7, inclusive. Now, to make it an overwhelming success, we shall want Col. Ingersoll and the National Liberal League to meet with us. Our workers are well aroused, and we are determined to hav over fifty Leagues before our camp-meeting. I am directing all our energies toward the taxation of church property. I think we will be able to send into our legislature a petition bearing the sigatures of not less than fifty thousand names. We keep Prof. Phelps busy the whole of the time. The subcommittee of the National Liberal League for Kansas is now composed of two men and three women. That is women's rights."

The Committee on Resolutions at the Cincinnati Liberal League Congress were Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Washington, D. C.; W. T. Auten, Nashville, Tenn.; Dr. T. L. Brown, Binghamton, N.Y.; Gen. B. A. Morton, New Haven, Conn.; J. H. B. Perkins, Bellville, Kan.; Henry Damon, Boston, Mass.; Wm. Barnsdall, Titusville, Pa.; Mrs. O. M. Hechtman, Washington, D. C.; J. G. Michener, Texas. It was understood that Col. Ingersoll drafted the three resolutions, which were assented to by the other able members of the Committee and unanimously reported to the Congress, and then most enthusiastically adopted by the large body of intelligent Liberals present without a dissenting vote. And notwithstanding all this the "consensus of the competent" says of these resolutions, and those who drafted them, that "all three were concocted in cowardice, hypocrisy, and fraud. They are a disgrace to those who drafted them and a disgrace to all who defend them." I suppose the decision of this high tribunal is final.

Bro. S. L. Ruggles makes an enthusiastic appeal to hav the next Liberal League Congress at Bismarck Grove, Kan. "By all means let us, as you advise, hav the next Liberal League Congress for 1880 at Bismarck Grove, Kansas. It is the most appropriate and central spot on the continent and the easiest of access from all directions. I am not sure but it equals 'Academic Grove' of ancient Greece, in which the sages and philosophers of that age assembled to receive and impart wisdom. I know that it is indeed one of nature's first and grandest temples and a fitting spot on which to baptize the National Liberal League with the spirit of universal liberty. To Bismarck they will come from the upper and lower Mississippi, from the Rocky Mountains, from the Pacific Slope, from the factories of New England, and from the Alleghanies and along the lakes of the North, and from the provinces of Canada. We will welcome all of every class, kin, and nationality irrespective of whose shibboleth they pronounce. Let them come to the home of John Brown and receive the inspiration of his spirit that is still marching the race on to a full, free, and complete enfranchisement. Come to Bismarck Grove, and the old cry of 'Kansas and freedom' will be telegraphed around the globe."

The following extracts from letters just received are encouraging. Clayton Crasson, of Union Star, Ky., writes: "I am confident that we will succeed in the organization of a League in this place within a few weeks." D. P. Wilcox writes from Yankton, Dakota: "The time has arrived in the career of this city for the first step to be taken towards forming a Liberal League. I think now, after having hoped and waited and almost despaired, that I can make the thing work." Mr. Wm. L. Worley writes from Pescadero, Cal., that he is prepared to build a Liberal hall at La Honda, San Mateo county, Cal., and then form a League. Mr. John Sears, a leading business man there and a Liberalist, proposes to build the hall. Kersey Graves writes: "After a serious disqualification for business I hav got so far restored that I am packing up and will start to-morrow. Will report to you my operations every week." J. Warr writes from Paterson, N. J., "I am pleased to inform you that our League is growing faster than I ever anticipated it would." O. A. Phelps writes from Osage, Kan.: "Closed a seven-night's engagement here yesterday. Charter applied for. H. L. R. Jones, President; C. G. Waite, Secretary. Hope to organize at Parsons this week also." A. Whiting, of Melissa, Tex., says: "Having read your article in last Mind and Matter, hav concluded to get up a Liberal League here if you will be kind enough to forward instructions, blanks, etc. Texas needs some such thing badly. In some portions of the state it is dangerous to express one's opinions unless they are strictly orthodox." D. S. McCherne reports from Walnut City, Iowa: "We wish to have a permanent Liberal League organized here. We hav had four meetings, and I am proud to say some of our best citizens are earnest in this cause. Send blanks, etc., so we can hav them at our next meeting, the first Saturday of next month."

H. L. Green.

Notes and News from Iowa.

Names of Liberals are always acceptable. I want some from every post-office in the state. Send them right along, accompanied by a few stamps for correspondence.

Prof. O. A. Phelps is achieving a splendid reputation in Kansas as a lecturer and debater. Bro. Campfield says that he is "doing more to advance our cause than any other man in the state."

I wish all secretaries of auxiliaries would send me a list of their officers and members, the programme of exercises at their meetings, the progress of Liberal ideas in their neighborhoods, etc.

The Second Annual National Liberal Encampment will be held at Bismarck Grove, Kansas, September 1st to 7th, inclusive. The Fourth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League should be held at the same time and place.

I would call the attention of Liberal workers everywhere to the many excellent suggestions contained in Mr. B. F. Babbitt's article on "Taxation of Church Property" in The Truth Seeker of March 8th. It is very timely and good.

At Farley, Dubuque county, the ultra-orthodox attempted to defeat two candidates for councilmen because they were Freethinkers, but the friends of freedom and toleration rallied and elected them, to the exceeding chagrin and rage of the would-be bulldozers.

Mr. Thomas S. Keltner, of Perlee, has accepted the chairmanship for Jefferson county. Mr. Keltner is an earnest Liberal, a resident of the county from his childhood, and he should receive the active and substantial aid of every friend of secularization in the county. He wishes to organize a League at Fairfield, and wants a lecturer there.

Bravo for that gallant veteran of freedom, Amy Post! Her letter to the "great apostate" is the best thing of the season! Now, will the rest of our loyal Liberals, whose names are yet on the list of vice-presidents, and of the Executive Committee of the "Liberal Union," follow her worthy example, and order them erased from that black list?

I shall be out over the state engaged in the work of organization most of the time for the next six months, and will answer calls to speak upon the various reforms advocated by the National Liberal League. I hope to meet many of the friends of secularization and to increase the circulation of our papers. Address me at Norway (formerly Florence), Benton county, Iowa.

Mrs. Annie L. Millard, of Osceola, Clark county, has written out a Constitution and set of by-laws for the organization of a Liberal Life Insurance Aid Association. I think that something of the kind is needed. All of the united and secret aid associations at present existing hav so much superstition mixed in in various ways that no self-respecting Freethinker can feel at home therein. I would suggest that our friends who think favorably of such a movement enter into correspondence with Mrs. Millard.

Our Iowa Liberals should see to it that Professor Bell invade our state during his forthcoming trip West. We certainly need him here, for we are behindhand in the work of organization, and he is a great organizer and an earnest and honest friend of the League. Then Bro. Bell is a gentleman well qualified to defend the principles of Freethought, and a genial, whole-souled man. Many towns and cities in Iowa hav been calling for a speaker. Let them at once write to Bro. Bell, 73 Fourth street, New Bedford, Mass.

Our petition for taxation of church property was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The bill providing for such taxation was "indefinitely postponed," as recommended by the committee which reported it. This settles the question so far as this legislature is concerned, and now we must go to work for the fight in 1882. The first thing to be done is to thoroughly organize by counties and townships. This petition must be at every polling-place in the state upon election-day, 1881. Get all the names you can between now and then, and on that day hav the petition in the hands of a live, conscientious worker. In the mean time we hav another work to which we must assiduously devote ourselves. I mean the circulation of the anti-Comstock postal-law petition. This petition should be at every voting-place on election-day of this year. Let us all work for equal rights and a secular state as we hav never worked before. The enemies of liberty are vigilant, the traitors and cowards hav opened the gates of our fortress to the foe, and we must muster our whole force to repel the attack thus perfidiously brought upon us.

The Index speaks of the expressed opinion of J. Vila Blake, in favor of its course, as "a vote to be weighed, not counted." Is it so gross as that? Mr. Abbot parades a letter from E. W. Meddaugh, in which that gentleman says:

"The argument of 'unconstitutionality' against these laws, so far as it has come under my observation, is a pitiful exhibition of ignorance and legal sophistry. To say nothing of the reasons based on general principles in favor of their validity, the Supreme Court of the United States, which is conceded to be the final arbiter on national constitutional questions, has, in numerous decisions, fully sustained the power of Congress in this class of legislation. In the light of its judgments, no lawyer capable of dealing with such questions, who has not been forced out of intellectual plumb by the exigencies of a bad cause, can seriously doubt the constitutionality of these laws."

Here we hav it again—the ever-recurring worship of authority as authority! Suppose that the Supreme Court has decided that these postal laws are constitutional, or that laws of the same class are constitutional, it does not prove that they are, and it is no surety that this same court may not reverse its own decision. Judges are but men—lawyers of more or less ability—and they are no more infallible than bishops of Rome or editors of "public morality" journals. We hav not forgotten that this "final arbiter" once decided that negroes had no rights which white men were bound to respect; and the bloody reversal of that decision is still more fresh in the minds of our people. Every step forward of humanity has been in direct defiance of the owlish wisdom of just such "final arbiters" as our Supreme Court. Three grains of common sense are worth more in the discussion of this question than ten thousand tomes of legal lore, if their readers and expounders are prejudiced fossils and pious partisans. Does Mr. Meddaugh suppose that Freethinkers are going to bow to the decision of a Supreme Court simply because it is a Supreme Court? If so he is terribly mistaken. Notice the infinite impudence of this pronunciamento: "In the light of its judgments, no lawyer capable of dealing with such questions, who has not been forced out of intellectual plumb by the exigencies of a bad cause, can seriously doubt the constitutionality of these laws." All hats off to the supreme, infallible junto! Let no "pettifogger" presume to examine the Constitution and this question for himself. He has no business to think unless his thoughts are an echo of its "judgments." Seriously, does Mr. Meddaugh suppose that the people of this country are going to permit the establishment of a censorship of the press (for, in effect, it is nothing else—a moral supervision and theological inspection of the mail-sacks of the nation) simply because a few ermined lawyers, of more or less wisdom, decide that such censorship, supervision, and inspection are constitutional? People of my country, arouse, ere it is too late! E. C. Walker.

From Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Second Annual National Liberal Encampment will be held at Bismarck Grove, Lawrence, Kansas, September 1st to 7th inclusive.

We are exceedingly anxious that the National Liberal League Congress should be held at the same time and place. The location of this grove is near the center of the United States, it is accessible by rail from all parts of the country, while the beauty of the place is unsurpassed.

The Liberal element in this state is wide awake and marching forward to victory. Yours, E. Campfield.

Wyandotte, Kansas, March 7, 1880.

Osage Mission, Kan., March 8, 1880.

Editor of Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: I closed a seven-night engagement here last week with the formation of a good League. Sent for charter this morning. H. L. R. Jones, President; C. G. Waite, Secretary. I go to Parsons this week, and hope to organize there also.

Yours very truly, O. A. Phelps.

The Two Moralities.—Concluded.

Now there is another view to take of natural morality. The motor forces of the human soul, those busy little suggestors that guide the individual and prompt him to act—the five senses, touch, smell, taste, sight, hearing—hav all had their period of eclipse, of repression, of being regulated, limited, bound down, fenced in, and starved by codes of priestly, ecclesiastical, and, in modern days, Christian morals; just as the passion of love is now suppressed, traduced, and regulated by Christian morals. The sense of touch has been tortured by hair-cloth, crowns of thorns, peas in the shoes, dust and ashes, sores, vermin, and the gospel of dirt generally. The smell and all sense and enjoyment of perfumes hav been similarly proscribed, and could not but be excruciated in sympathy with touch and the unfragrant state of the universally unwashed Christian skin. The taste and the whole realm of the alimentative appetite hav suffered untold tortures. Indeed this passion has had enough to endure, even at the hands of natural morality; and the impositions of priestly, ecclesiastic, and Christian starvation hav been wholly gratuitous and needless. The Christian domination over this passion for eating has continued, though with lessening rigor, down to our own day. We still hav fast days, and this very essay is co-ordinating its ideas in the holy season of Lent, when Christians generally hav gone a fishing, or hunting hens' eggs, and when pigs and chickens are taking a rest.

Sight and hearing, being more in the nature of air and sunshine, could not easily be bottled up. Yet there hav been any number of religious laws and Christian regulations as to what must not be seen and shall not be heard. Dress has been regulated and color proscribed as originating with the very devil. I can never forget a memory of my childhood, in the Methodist connection, in whose faith I was infantilely baptized, and on whose pap I was brought up. Sister Lippit put an "artificial flower" in the ungodly fabrication that only by divine grace, at that early day, and in that backwoods settlement, could be called a bonnet; and the commotion of busy tongues and flying scandal that buzzed around those sap bushes, and that log schoolhouse where the church met every Sunday, by divine permission, when the creek wan't too high, has never been equaled till the Beecher era.

After dress, undress has always been just as wicked to be seen. Ecclesiasticism has never been able to be satisfied either way. The nude in art has had a world of Christian discussion, and has passed through alternate periods of favor and of frown; but the realisms of nude nature hav always been denounced by Bible Christians as right out of the depths of total depravity, and prone to central hell as the sparks fly upward. The scenes of the theater hav always been forbidden as obscene, and the Christian old lady who avowed in prayer-meeting, with trembling voice and uplifting of hands, that she "had been through scenes and —unseens," about balanced her chances for an abode among the blessed.

Last of all, as to the sense of hearing; freedom of speech, or of expression of opinion in any shape, has always been regulated and as far as possible suppressed. The kind of song and music fit for the human ear hav been prescribed and regulated by the priesthood of every age and by the Christian church of this last era. The devil has confessedly, from time immemorial, had "all the best tunes," which the pious wanted but did not dare to touch with their harp of a thousand strings. Their "jealous God" would neither play them himself nor let the devil, if he could help it—which he couldn't always.

These five senses hav now all very nearly or quite emancipated themselves, so that the individual of this later age has the right to eat unquestioned what suits his appetite, has the right of private judgment as to what flowers or fragrances he shall smell, what clothing he shall wear, what sights he shall see, what sounds he shall hear. He is permitted variety, too, in all these senses. If, on attaining his majority, he betrays a liking for strawberries, he is not bound to obey any morally frugivorous law to eat strawberries and them alone till death do him part. It don't imperil the highest good of the cosmos if he eats peaches even the very same day. Indeed cooks hav been known to arrange a symposium on a kind of chromatic scale of all the tastes they could include, and men and women hav seated and sated themselves at such feasts without our special wonder. If the "thunders of Sinai" did break on their ear, some reveler would only casually remark a doubt about "much of a shower." So also a man may hear a song, a violin, or a seven-octave grand piano, and all at once, if he chooses, then turn from them to the indulgence of a tin whistle if he likes, without prematurely bringing on the crack of doom.

Passing on from the bodily forces we come to some motors in the human soul of a higher type, such as ambition, friendship, love, paternity (philoprogenitiveness). A man may hav two or three ambitions, and desire to excel in two or three departments of art, or science, or industry, or in all three of them at once. A man may also hav any number of friendships. The more friends he has the more respectable he is accounted to be. A man may love any number of children—his own or those of anybody else—without loss of character. It is not till you come to the great central, pivotal passion of love that you light on the last discouraged, shattered remains of Christian morality. Here they are, barracked and bivouacked in one strong hold. Here is the last ditch of the demoralized, retreating, embattled hosts. Their first law is, "Thou shalt hav no other Gods before me, for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God;" and the same relationship the Christian man holds to his God the Christian woman holds to the Christian man—and it is monotheism and monanthropism throughout, for her. The obsequious subserviency of Catherine, Queen of England, daughter of Ferdinand of Spain, and wife of Henry the Eight, has been the lot of every woman, however high or however low, for ages before and centuries since, by the written and unwritten law of Christian morality. Catherine, in a Christian court composed of bishops, archbishops, and cardinals, repudiates their jurisdiction and addresses the cowardly, priest-governed king in these burning words:

"Alas, sir,
In what hav I offended you? What cause
Hath my behavior given to your displeasure,
That thus you should proceed to put me off,
And take your good grace from me? Heaven witness,
I hav been to you a true and humble wife,
At all times to your will conformable;
Ever in fear to kindle your dislike,
Yea, subject to your countenance; glad, or sorry,
As I saw it inclined. When was the hour
I ever contradicted your desire,
Or made it not mine too? Or which of your friends
Hav I not strove to love, although I knew
He were mine enemy? What friend of mine
That had to him derived your anger, did I Continue in my liking? Nay, gave notice
He was from thence discharged?

Christian morality required all this subordination, this slavery, this sacrifice of the woman to the man, of one human being to another; and yet, after all this sacrifice of herself to him, she was again sacrificed to the State, to the founding of a dynasty. For this life-long devotion she earned, and at the hands of a Christian court obtained, divorce and repudiation.

Natural morality decrees with Emerson, "Giv all to love;" and stand by woman at all hazards. Natural morality demands the sovereignty not subserviency of woman in all this sex realm; and separations, when they must come, should be decreed for other causes than convenience, descent of property, or reasons of state.

In further elucidation of the "two moralities," the following article from the Index of Jan. 17, 1878. It was written as my first protest against the downward and backward departure upon which Mr. Abbot had then just entered:

DEFINITIONS DESIRED.—OBSCENITY, IMMORALITY, DECENCY, PURITY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX: I feel on the subject of morals as your correspondent Mr. Stark does in relation to money—"Tempted I am to launch into a disquisition on definition. All our woes come of bad ones. A good definition is better than precious stones, or much fine gold. . . All reasoning depends on definition."

How much can be settled and how many agreements effected by accurate definition in all departments of discussion! The Comstock aggressions hav brought up the subject of "obscenity;" and, in your treatment of it, you warn Liberals against the consequences of "immorality."

Now it seems to me we cannot move a step, and can hav no clear understanding as between ourselves, and no idea of the strategy of our opponents, till we know what it is obscene to print, and what it is immoral to do. But when we come to dictionary building, who is to hav the contract, and who shall be authorized to make it? Whose definition are Liberals bound to take? Are we to be admonished to quietly submit to the old definitions, and so practically let the Christians impose the cant meaning of their old words upon us? Are progress and science to be demanded in religion, while morals are left to be prescribed by the sectaries and the bigots? Is religion to be free, and morals to be kept yet other centuries under the old Papal and Puritanic bonds? For one, the present writer repudiates the illogical discrimination. If we are to hav a recast of religion, and the slag of cant and whim and unreason is to be smelted out of it, I demand that the old morals be tried by the same fire and in the same furnace. Science will be just as good for morals as for religion; and nothing will go to everlasting smash except what ought to go, any more by scientizing the one than the other. What does it matter to me if I am tolerated in the worship of free religion, but am jugged in jail on an orthodox definition of immorality? I cannot see that the Liberals of the country gain anything by pulling down a religious Pope and setting up a moral one; puncturing and collapsing an Evangelical Infallibility and leaving his moral counterpart standing there stark, strong, and malignant, to gobble us up on his own terms.

In the evolution that all things are undergoing, and amid the changes and modifications that inevitably come over all institutions, it cannot be that the department of morals is a Medo-Persic one, that must stand stock still. In a vortex of perpetual movement, it cannot be that the ancient code of morals was established so perfect at first, and has run so smoothly through all these centuries, that it, of all things, needs no change and is unchangeable.

When the editor of the Index (Dec. 6th) says, "Unjust as it is, this suspicion [of a necessary connection between so-called 'Infidelity' and 'immorality'] lays a double duty upon every Liberal to keep himself above all possibility of being charged with immorality, either of act or word," there are Liberals who would like to know whose morals he appeals to us to obey, and whose immoralities to keep ourselves above. Can it be possible that he asks us to be the abject and unquestioning slaves of the morals prescribed by the Young Men's Christian Association? Does he mean to implore us to go through our remaining years asking Anthony Comstock what it is moral to do in the conduct of life? If not, whose morals does he mean us to imitate, and who are to be the definers of immorality?

I suggest, and with proud defiance of the old orthodox sentinels who hav so long stood guard over me, that Liberals define their own morals as they do their own religion. It is time that the light of science was let into morals as well as into religion; and time that Liberals were permitted to liv their own lives, unshadowed by any moral pope and unawed by any censor, except what science and the constitution of things prescribe. For my single self, I enlarge the old Protestant demand, and claim freedom of conscience and the right of private judgment, not only as to what it is religious to believe, but as to what it is moral to do. Ever observant of the rights of others, I claim my own. Careful always to do no wrong to another, I am responsible, and ready always to take the consequences of my own acts. I am a joint owner of this planet, along with the rest of the fourteen hundred million dwellers upon it; and I am not to be evicted from my share because there are foxes who hav forgotten their cunning and are willing to be cropped. I am born with a box ticket that takes me through the house; and armed with that ticket of essential manhood and equality, Christian keepers will, at their peril, deny me admission through all doors authorized to be opened by it. And this my defiance, I am persuaded, is that of every other Liberal "who has a keen sense of honor," and whose individuality has not been suppressed and flattened out, under the great super-incumbent, evangelical, orthodox mass.

Now let's hav the defining begin; and since the words at the head of this article hav been called into sudden use and prominence, they are first in order. THERON C. LELAND.

New York, Dec. 24, 1877.

"[We are sorry that Mr. Leland did not 'begin,' after all. The Index has been too long a pleader for scientific ethics to be afraid of definitions, and is quite ready to discuss any which hav a prima facie claim on attention. The morality it advocates is the morality of nature, and not of any 'pope;' but we are curious to know what the trouble is with the proposition which seems to hav disturbed our correspondent. It appears to us to be very like a mere truism—what ails it?—Editor Index]"

The "what ails it?" is characteristic of that editor. It shows that the real significance of the eighth Demand had never got into his head. It was impossible for that theologic brain of his to perceive that his "proposition" and his "eighth Demand" did not and could not "consist."

But there is another Demand of Liberalism, and that is that every discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER must some time or other come to an end. This essay must now submit to that terminal fate, although a whole book could be written about Christian morality, and another about natural morality. There is more to say about those contradictory morals, but I leave it for others to say.

The eighth Demand is now before Liberals with a little more prominence than has hitherto been given it. Is it a true Demand, and ought it to be maintained? Are there two moralities, and ought one to be repudiated and the other accepted as the true guide in the conduct of life? Is not the eighth Demand a legitimate, important, even urgent subject for discussion in the League and Liberal associations of the country, and by writers and editors in their journals? I hav made my contribution; let others take it up.

201 E. 71st St., New York. THERON C. LELAND.

Is Materialism Bigotry?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Before I accepted a place in the ranks of the League movement I had many a severe struggle to undergo between inclination and principle on the one side, and what is called policy on the other. As a Freethinker, I wished to be forever untrammeled by any set of rules made by a number of Freethinkers collectively. The very name of organization, league, etc., was distasteful to me, as it yet is to thousands of other Freethinkers. I wished to do my own thinking always, preserve my individuality, and promote Liberalism in my own way. I did not wish to be made responsible to, nor responsible for, others' thoughts and sentiments. But it was represented to me that individual effort was of little avail, and that to vanquish the common enemy—orthodoxy and Christian bigotry—the union of all Liberals, of whatever shade of opinion, was necessary, indeed a sine qua non condition of success. I acquiesced in these opinions of friends reluctantly, it must be confessed; but having once done so, and buckled on my armor, I shall stay at my post and serve out my time of enlistment, which is for the war.

I hav spoken of sacrifices of principles and inclinations, which I had made for the sake of policy. I do not speak of them from any spirit of vanity, but as a statement of fact merely. Hundreds of others hav done the same, and it is because they hav done so that I beg to serve notice on Mr. E. A. Chapman that the union between ourselves and the Spiritualists, which is both unnatural and distasteful to either parties, will cease as soon as we hav accomplished the common object, the total separation of church and state. After that it will be war to the knife between ourselves and the believers in "planchette," "mesmerism," and "spooks." There can be no true union except for purposes defensive between empiricists and Spiritualists; they are the day and night of modern thought, and Mr. Babcock, so far from being a bigot in serving this notice upon our present allies, has only voiced the sentiment of the adherents of the Materialistic philosophy and shown himself to be honest and above board.

If the Spiritualists do not like this declaration, let them withdraw. There were a thousand Thebans at Thermopylæ who offered their services to Leonidas against the common enemy, the Persians. But he of the lion heart refused, and with his three hundred Spartans alone bore the brunt of battle; and since he could not be victorious, he died at their head fighting, and divided the glory with none. The Materialists feel like the noble Lacedæmonian; we would rather let the Spiritualists go their way, and with our own little but compact band oppose the enemy and divide the honor of victory or the mortification of defeat with none. But since we hav joined the Liberal League, I presume we must accept the offer of the Thebans, and there is truce among us for the nonce.

"The great Huxley," quoth Mr. Chapman, "says that Spiritualism is not worthy his attention." My sentiments precisely, and the sentiments of every real Freethinker. When Mr. Chapman has once successfully shown the falsity of the axiomatic truth, "No force without matter, no matter without force," it will be time enough for people to bother with "disembodied spirits," "immaterial intelligences," "supernatural phenomena," and other paraphernalia from the property and lumber-room of modern Spiritualism. When a man has sufficiently abdicated reason and common sense to quit the safe road of a posteriori reasoning to follow the ignis fatuus of ghostly manifestation through the swamps and quagmires of a priori argumentation; when he is ready to postulate a spook for every unknown cause of visible effect; when he is not satisfied with what may be known, but must hav a ready-made and rounded-off system by which to explain the unknown and unknowable; when he puts his trust, instead of in the investigations and demonstrations of exact science, in the babblings and hallucinations of hysteric dark-lantern mediums; when he is ready to exchange the orthodox heaven for the shining shore of phantoms, who spend their leisure time in rapping on tables, playing on banjos and tamborines, writing silly twaddle on slates, turning households into pandemonia, and making themselves generally disagreeable; when he is cured of the orthodox disease, only to be in turn afflicted with the transcendental distemper, why then he is ready to turn Spiritualist. If it be bigotry to say this, make the most of it!

Mr. Chapman complains very much, I notice, of the bigotry of Materialists and scientists. He forgot to speak of the bigotry of facts, which we all know are very stubborn things, with no tolerance about them whatever. Very unfortunate (indeed it is!) that Spiritualism and facts are at war with each other, though presumably it will be so much the worse for Spiritualism. Comparisons are proverbially lame, but to liken the attitude of exact science towards the phantasmagoria of Spiritualism to the conduct of the Catholic hierarchy towards Galileo, is the most decrepit of all. Galileo taught that which could be demonstrated, while to speak of so-called Spiritual phenomena as "truths" is begging the question. It won't do.

Nor will it do, Mr. Chapman, to cite Prof. Ernst Haeckel as an authority in support of your theories. You dare not show me a line that Haeckel, who is universally considered the most radical, advanced, and profound exponent of Materialism, has written on your side of the question. You dare not because you cannot! There is not a German scientist to-day of any established reputation as such that is not a Materialist, pure and simple. Can you quote me one work written in German, and by an acknowledged scientist, in which Zollner, who was humbugged by Dr. Slade (a medium convicted in England as a swindler and for obtaining money under false pretenses), as a scientific authority? You cannot do it. It won't do for you to cite genial, wholesouled Robert Dale Owen, who was taken in by the Katie King fraud in Philadelphia, along with hundreds of others, and indorsed the show in the innocence of his heart and the firmness of his belief, as a scientific authority. It won't do to quote Mr. Kiddle as a scientific authority, and it won't do to talk of scientific women, and then not giv the names even. A scientific woman is pre-eminently a rara avis, and when caught we should like to see the plumage.

Mr. Chapman states the conditions under which we bigoted Materialists are willing to be converted so precisely that I need say no more about them. But I beg to remind the gentleman that "mind-reading," "unconscious cerebration," "psychic force," "odyllic force," and "mesmerism" are terms not to be found in the vocabulary of exact science. They are terms that hav been discarded by all real scientists, men who do not skim the surface, but go to the bottom of things. CHAS. J. HERBOLD.

Bible in School.

BY M. BABCOCK.

There are gods of to-day, there were gods in the past,
Some ride on the clouds, and one rode on an ass.

TO THE HON. SCHOOL BOARD OF ST. JOHNS, GENTLEMEN: We are told that one of these gods wrote a book; that it givs us all the information that is necessary upon the subject of the gods; and we are told that this particular one lived all alone by himself. Getting lonesome he made a heaven, and furnished it with a devil for a companion. The devil kicked up a big row; God might hav killed him, but he preferred sending him to this world that he might kick up still another row, and destroy the happiness of the human family. We are told that God knoweth all things—the past, the present, and the future. Therefore, when he made man he knew that he was making him for the devil. After he made man he set a trap, baited it with an apple, and stood back and watched, till the devil sprung it and caught his man just as God had intended. If God had not been well pleased with the man, he could easily hav killed him, and made another one with which to start the world. It would hav taken only ten minutes for him to hav completed the job, and possibly he might hav made the second man snake-proof and thereby conferred a priceless blessing upon the human family. Sin first originated in heaven—after which God sent the old sinner to establish sin in this world. His agent, the devil, succeeded, and God was satisfied. So, instead of killing his man and starting anew, God cursed him, and told him and his wife to multiply and replenish the earth (with sin); and after they had lived a thousand years, and, with the devil's help, got sin established on a firm basis, God permitted them to die in this world that he might torment them in hell for ever and ever. Splendid demonstration of love and mercy!

After having, for thousands of years, sent all of the descendants of our first parents to the place of fire and brimstone, punishing them not for their own sins but giving them hell on account of the acts or indiscretion of their parents, God concluded, in his great mercy, to ease up a little, in consideration of the fact that they had had no hand in the apple business. So he contrived a plan by which those who were not already in hell might be saved. He wrote a book explaining his plan, and, after experimenting for hundreds of years with the halter, racks, thumbscrews, ripping-knives, swords, and the fagot, drenching the earth with blood and tears, at last the world has got to understanding God's book so well that he is now able, after eighteen hundred years, to save about one out of each thousand of his children.

The plan of salvation has not proved thus far a very brilliant success. God might, if he would, now kill the devil, wipe out the apple account, and save the rest of the world. But he says, "No; except ye believe ye shall be damned." So he keeps on damning, damning, damning, and souls keep dropping, dropping, dropping, into the flames of hell. No postponement on account of the weather. No distinction on account of sex, race, or color. Night and day, at the rate of one every second, human souls are damned, and slide into the bottomless pit. And such, gentlemen, is the teaching of the Bible.

We are told that God will "chain the devil (when he gets ready to do so) for a thousand years, after which he will again be let loose for a little season." The letting the old devil loose again evidently is for the reason that God cannot bear to see the world happy; so he lets loose again his agent of hell that he may continue once more to lead men into the places of sin. Another evidence of God's great wisdom, justice, love, and mercy!

This book tells us that God had several boys, and that he arranged to hav one of them killed, as a means of saving us from endless misery. This one was called Jesus, and, unlike his brothers, he was not extremely fond of the girls, for he never took a wife. In speaking of his other boys, God says: "The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose" (Gen. vi. 2). But these boys were not begotten, for he says that Jesus was his "only begotten son." So we are to suppose that his other sons "just growed," or maybe he made them out of dust. We are told that Jesus taught the most sublime truths; but it was he who said, "He who believeth shall be saved, and he who believeth not shall be damned." How sublime! And then comes the command, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" Splendid!

Now, I want it understood, gentlemen, that I hav no respect for any book, God, Son of God, or human being who will pollute the imagination of childhood by taking into our public school a book which teaches that infamous lie, the dogma of an eternal hell!

The Bible is a book of hell, and the creed of every orthodox church founded on this book is the creed of hell. Take the book of hell into your parlors and churches, if you will, but do not, in violation of law, justice, and decency, force it into our public school against the wishes of a single taxpayer, and thereby compel him to pay for that which he does not want.

If man is not good enough to be saved, God at least might let him, after he is dead, sleep the eternal sleep of death. But no; says this merciful God: "I hav not forgot that apple business; therefore I say, Arise, ye dry bones and dust, and be eternally damned!—damned by a just God, who loveth his children! Arise, ye dimpled-cheeked babes and innocent little children of Sodom and Gomorrah, for I who burned your little helpless bodies with fire and brimstone whilst living in this world am capable of burning your little souls with fire and brimstone in hell. Ye seas, giv up the dead! let none escape! Arise, and be damned! damned! damned!" Hell! hell! is the destiny of the great bulk of the human family, according to the teachings of the Bible.

The story of God's burning up living little babes is either true or it is false; if false, the Bible is a liar; and if true, it stamps God as being worse than a demon and unworthy of the worship of man.

But why should God hav cursed the snake? The snake was not to blame. It was a helpless creature, taken possession of like the herd of swine by the devil. But God always has punished the innocent for the crimes of the guilty. The hogs were all drowned and the serpent was cursed, but the old devil went scot-free, without even a reprimand, and to-day is working and beating God his creator in the great struggle for souls at the rate of ninety-nine to the one hundred. But God won't kill the devil. And why? because he wants to damn more souls.

I say, gentlemen, Oh, bosh! ain't you ashamed to take such nonsense into a public school! Must the superstitious dogmas of the past still be forced upon the civilization of the nineteenth century?

Obituary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Our old and long suffering friend, Mr. Daniel Mason, has finally passed, at the age of seventy-eight, into the realms of the great unknown. And of him it can truthfully be said,

"Nothing in his life
Became him like the leaving it; he died
As one who had been studied in his death."

Mr. Mason, in the years embracing the period between 1823 and 1833, was an active participant in all the reformatory efforts of those times, of which humanity, I am happy to bear witness, is now more or less reaping the benefit. This great reformatory upheaval, looking towards a higher condition of humanity, bold and surprising as it was, the most active spirits therein were observed to be radical Materialists. All theological pretensions were fearlessly and perhaps rather rudely handled.

From this outburst for universal emancipation of the human mind from every species of bondage, the world is greatly indebted for various radical and daring movements, viz., the abolishment of imprisonment for debt; the divorce of church and state; an inquiry into the bold assumptions of theology; a better understanding of our popular banking system, and a homestead on the public lands to actual settlers, etc., etc. In fact, there was a ruthless examination into the social relations and rights of man, and an irreverent, so to speak, analyzation of the first principles of government.

This Materialistic and scientific element was fearlessly stirred into activity by the eloquence of Miss Frances Wright, the elder Robert Owen, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Jennings, George H. Evans, and his brother, Frederick Evans, the present Shaker elder. With this boiling vortex of Radicalism our friend Mason was found fully identified. By some it might seem strange that a well-grounded Materialist should so far lay aside his bigotry (for science has its bigots) and dignity as to allow the philosophy of a lifetime to be completely demolished by the tippings of a mahogany or common pine kitchen-table. But so it was. The kitchen-table, the rappings, the trance-speaking, the involuntary writings; the secret identifications from departed friends through various occult channels, were too much for him, as it has been for thousands, and he had to yield. Hence he became, years before his death, an avowed material Spiritualist; but he learned to look with kindly commiseration on all those who were less fortunate in their researches.

He was long prostrated, and hopelessly so in his last sickness, by a wasting consumption; but his tedium was somewhat relieved by the daily attendance of his friends, both ladies and gentlemen. He had the happiness to hav the affectionate ministrations of an amiable wife, who shared fully with him the same cheering belief, and who had, for the space of fifty-two years, been a participant in all his vicissitudes.

Whether Spiritualism be delusion or not, certain it is it had a remarkable sustaining buoyancy upon the positive mind of friend Mason.

About a month before he passed away he expressed a desire to hav an evening's entertainment of the nature of a musical party. Music was a thing of which he was extremely fond, and, as he expressed it, he wanted to go off with "flying colors." To gratify him (but with much misgiving) his friends, both ladies and gentlemen, assembled to the number of about thirty; and although he was too feeble to sit up in bed, his position was so arranged that he could enjoy the festivities that passed before him.

His general blandness of manners through life always gained the respect of all those who chanced to form his acquaintance, and in his long, tedious sickness drew around him many sympathetic friends.

A few weeks before his departure, an elderly, sympathetic lady of the Methodist persuasion called to see him on a mission of condolence, and after looking at him steadfastly for a few moments, inquired: "Mr. Mason, are you a Christian?" He looked at the lady steadily, and replied, "Mrs. A., I can readily say I am no Christian." The lady paused, evidently much surprised. "But you believe in the Bible, Mr. Mason?" Our friend gave her a firm look and said: "Mrs. A., I think you could not hav read the book, or you would not ask a dying man such a question. Yes, Mrs. A., I do believe the Bible; and I do believe, for obscenity, indecency, vulgarity, immorality, and fraud, it surpasses any book in the English or any other language." The pious Mrs. A. looked at the sick man with awe-struck astonishment, and in a few minutes quietly left his presence.

Being an expert electrician, the subject next the adjustment of his domestic affairs to which he was keenly sensitive was the success of Mr. Edison's electric light, for which he expressed ardent hopes.

A few days before his death, the same pious lady called in upon him and affectionately expressed her sympathies again. "Mr. Mason," she remarked, "not a night passes but my husband and myself, before retiring, offer up prayers for your recovery—we do, indeed." "Mrs. A.," he said, in his bland and gentlemanly way, "I fully appreciate your kind intentions, but I do wish you would discontinue them, for I hav no belief that any prayer ever made ever reached higher than the chimney-top; and to one who has not wholly abandoned his reason it is a species of moral blasphemy. So please do so no more."

If anything was inclined to raise his ire it was a reference to the unjust, cruel, and villainous incarceration of Mr. D. M. Bennett in prison as a state criminal. In fact, an old and intimate friend was excluded from his presence for expressing his approval of the sentence. Knowing the hopelessness of his recovery, no man wished more earnestly for death; and he pledged himself, if it was possible, soon as he was able, he would report his arrival on the other side, which, I am able to say, he has lately done.

In response to a request of a friend present at a private seance, he said, "Mr. M., you will remember the night of the party you did not show yourself because you were unwell." This was given through the tippings of a small table, and was perfectly true. Mr. M. did intend to be at the party, but was detained by sickness.

The well-merited eulogium pronounced over his remains by an old and distinguished Spiritual friend, in which he bore testimony of his unflinching honesty, sincerity, and sound moral example in all the walks of life, was fully indorsed by his numerous attendant friends.

Liberalism in the Green Mountain State.

[An esteemed correspondent, a resident of West Pawlet, Vermont, sends us the following report of the Spiritualists' and Liberalists' Convention recently held at that place:]

There was a Convention of Spiritualists and Liberals at West Pawlet, Vermont, February 20th, 21st, and 22d. E. V. Wilson, Dr. Fairfield, and Mrs. Kenyon, of Woodstock, were the speakers. The people turned out well; they had been feeding upon the bull-beef of Christianity until they hankered for something better.

The minister, who has been blowing away at Spiritualists ever since Captain Brown was here, has got all he wanted. Mr. Wilson laid down challenge after challenge and said, "If there is a minister in the house, for Christ's sake, for truth's sake, for the sake of humanity and your church, arise and defend your religion!" But he did not rise. Were his religion true, he could easily defend it. Truth will stand. Knowing this to be the case, he kept his seat. After Mr. Wilson is gone he will probably do the debating.

The Liberals now stand triumphant; they hav had their advocates here and offered debate, but the ministers hav actually said, "We guess we'll let 'em alone."

Christianity is crushed, and they stand preaching and praying amid its tumbling ruins. The bottom is smashed out of hell, the devil is dead, and these ministers will soon be obliged to earn an honest living.

A Step Forward.

A committee of the Albany Legislature has reported a bill taxing churches over the value of $10,000. This is the same as the law in force in New Hampshire, which passed that Legislature last year, and marks a step toward justice in the matter of forcing the opulent ecclesiastical institutions of the country to pay for the protection and privileges which they enjoy. The bill includes all private property, academies, libraries managed by private parties for the profit they giv, such as the Mercantile Library of this city, and all institutions not owned by the state. This is, with the exception of exempting the churches, even to the amount of a dollar, even and exact justice. State institutions should be tax-free, for to force them to pay is only transferring money from one pocket to the other, with considerable loss, on account of the habit our officials hav, in making transfers of value, of keeping a portion in their own hands. So far as it goes, the measure is a vast improvement upon the present tax law. No private institution of any kind should be exempt from taxation; and, in this sense, all schools, colleges, and libraries, deriving an income, either for the profit of their projectors or for self-support merely, are private institutions. They hav the benefit of the laws, their property is protected, and those who seek their benefits are required to contribute to their support. In no sense do they render the public at large an equivalent for the privileges they enjoy in common with other business concerns unless they are taxed.

But the bill, so far as it goes, stops short of the full measure of justice. There is no reason, moral, legal, or equitable, why churches should be exempt a single farthing. They demand and receive full protection from the state. They are corporate bodies of private citizens banded together to furnish, on the co-operative plan, worship of their God at the cheapest rates. If the same number of people should associate themselves together for any purpose, and should, in the furtherance of their ends, purchase and hold property, they would be compelled to pay taxes. We cannot see any reason why real estate, held for the worship of an indescribable Deity, should force people who do not believe it exists to pay for the protection of the property or the maintenance of the minister.

But when church property of immense value has been so long completely exempt from taxation, the Freethinkers of the country gain no slight point when the representatives of a popular government, assembled for the purpose of making just laws, even of one or two states, impose a tax upon so much of it as exceeds $10,000 in value. To this end we are indebted to the untiring exertions of the Liberals. In this state the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, H. L. Green, and Edgar M. Sellon, of the Buffalo League, hav contributed in no slight degree; and we flatter ourselves that THE TRUTH SEEKER has also been instrumental in securing this favorable report of an Assembly Committee.

It has recently been shown that the Catholic church—that medieval clog upon progress—of this city has, for the last ten or more years, not been content with having its property protected at state expense, but has made an annual drain upon our city treasury of nearly a half million dollars. Should this continue we might as well hav a state church, supported by the government. It amounts to the same thing in the end. But if all were taxed, and none subsidized for national, state, or municipal governments, every religious and sectarian tub would stand on its own bottom, and the fittest would survive. As it is, conflicting sects are enabled to scrape together enough money to make a first payment on a house and pay the registrar's fee to mortgage it, and then, by having no taxes, to hang along in a moribund condition. It would be better for them if half of the churches should die off, and better for the world if all of them were in ecclesiastical graves. On this subject one of our daily papers said recently:

"If this were a nation of Methodists, or Presbyterians, it would not be an unfair policy to exempt Methodist or Presbyterian churches from taxation to a limited extent, for that would be treating the whole community alike; or if it were a nation of religionists, no sect could complain if all sects were thus equally privileged. Rich congregations would hav no greater exemption than the poorer. All would be subjected to taxes upon the excess in value of their places of worship over the maximum of exemption established. But we are not a nation of Methodists, or of Presbyterians, or even of religionists. On the contrary, there is a vast, though silent, majority of unbelievers. Accepting none of the dogmas that fill the air about them, believing none and caring for none, in their indifference they seldom express their opinions, and their numbers are consequently unknown. They are without organization, for no "ism" buzzes in their brains which they are crazy to buzz into the brains of their neighbors; but in every town and city, in all classes of society, almost in the body of the church itself the component parts of this unnumbered multitude may be found. Passing over another kind of unbeliever, the man who subjects his opinions to the social and business power of the church, we may add that great mass of aggressive Infidels. Here, then, we hav an immense part of the body politic that is opposed more or less strenuously to religionists of all sects, and yet is compelled to bear an extra portion of the public burden, in order that houses of religious worship may be exempted. This is wrong in principle, and no limitation of the exemption can make it right. If religionists require houses of worship, which of course, come under the protection of the law, those houses should contribute their share of the expense of making and enforcing the law.

"In this state every man has a right to believe in religious matters as in all others to suit himself and in accordance with the suggestions of his own conscience; he has also a right to establish places and means for the enjoyment and propagation of his religious convictions. But others hav the same right to disbelieve that he has to believe, and the same right to an equal application and administration as well as protection of the law. The law is not equally administered and applied to them, if the burdens or a portion of the burdens that believers ought to bear are transferred to their shoulders without a corresponding benefit when they, having no interest in any house of worship or religious observance, are compelled to pay an extra rate of taxation to make up the deficiency caused by exemption to those who hav such houses.

"An unjust discrimination is made against a large portion of the community while exemption of church property from taxation exists to any extent, and it should be wholly removed."

It has always been a principle of the Christians to make others pay for what they enjoy. They purchased heaven with a man's life and avoided hell through his sufferings. They cast their own depravity on to the shoulders of an innocent man. The cowardice of the salvation scheme never troubles them. They are willing to enjoy what others pay for, whether seats and thrones in a golden heaven, or pews and ministers in marble churches. The burden of paying for both they throw on others. It is, perhaps, characteristic of the followers of a God who commanded his people to steal; but to Infidels, who pay for every obligation incurred, it looks like robbery.

From the Reception Committee.

The following communication from the Committee on Reception to Mr. Bennett explains itself. There are several plans before the Committee, and no final action has been taken, but by next week, probably, the Committee will decide. Notice will be given in time for all to participate:

TO THE FRIENDS OF MR. BENNETT EVERYWHERE: In New York, on the evening of the 8th of March, 1880, at an enthusiastic meeting of over fifty friends of Mr. Bennett, called together by the National Defense Association, a Committee of Arrangements was appointed to determine in what way a reception should be tendered to the Liberal editor on the expiration of his term of imprisonment, and to take charge of the preliminary movements to that end.

This Committee consisted of Messrs. Daniel E. Ryan, Ingersoll Lockwood, M. Reiman, Edward W. Searing, and Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr,, with power to add to its members as might be deemed expedient.

At a subsequent meeting of this Committee it was decided to add Prof. A. L. Rawson, the President of the National Defense Association, Mr. Hugh Byron Brown, the Treasurer, E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., Secretary, and T. C. Leland, Esq., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the same association, to this Committee of Arrangements.

At a meeting of the Committee of Arrangements, held at 120 Lexington avenue on the 15th of March, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously passed:

WHEREAS, Mr. D. M. Bennett was unfairly tried, unjustly convicted, and illegally sentenced, during the spring and summer of 1879, to a term of imprisonment, the charge being ostensibly the sending of an alleged obscene pamphlet through the United States mails, while the real animus of the prosecution and persecution, as revealed throughout the whole proceedings, was a determination on the part of the enemies of Mr. Bennett to remove him from his field of labors as a publisher of Liberal literature; and

WHEREAS, Two nearly successful attempts to obtain the Executive clemency in his behalf were conspicuously thwarted by the officious interference of his enemies, some of whom were in clerical robes, led on by a detective and spy acting in the interests of the cause of bigotry and superstition; be it

Resolved, That as Mr. Bennett's term of imprisonment expires on the 29th day of April, a reception be extended to the martyr editor on the succeeding Sunday (May 1st) at Cooper Institute, or other public hall, with speeches and music, or at Delmonico's or other popular house of entertainment, with dinner and after-dinner addresses, as may be determined upon by this committee.

Resolved, That the friends of Mr. Bennett in all parts of the country be invited to participate in the festivities of this peculiar occasion, when the doors of an American Bastile are opened for the release of one who has suffered a long term of imprisonment for having simply exercised the constitutional rights of an American citizen, he having committed no crime known to constitutional law, but having really fallen a victim to religious intolerance and superstition, in a country where liberty of conscience is supposed to be granted to every citizen; that on the evening of the New York meeting auxiliary meetings of two, three, a dozen, or one hundred, or more, friends of Mr. Bennett are invited to be held in their various localities, and to send telegrams of congratulation to the New York meeting while it is in session, making all necessary allowance for difference in time between the East and the West, and sending such electric messages between the hours of eight and ten P.M., New York time; that the various auxiliary Liberal Leagues friendly to Mr. Bennett be invited to do the same, and, where practicable, appoint one or more delegates to attend the grand reception in person.

Resolved, That all who approve of this programme be, and hereby are, invited to place themselves in communication with Daniel E. Ryan, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, whose address is 231 W. 37th street, in order that concert of action may be promoted, and the occasion be made as discouraging to the enemies of free press as it shall be inspiring to the friends of liberty everywhere, and especially to the hero of the hour.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, and other Liberal journals, and that all in every part in the country in sympathy with this movement be invited to bestir themselves immediately in taking the preliminary steps necessary to insure a triumphal success when the day for the release of Mr. Bennett shall arrive.

Since the meeting was held several friends hav been heard from. James Barney says put him down for $10; Dr. Wm. McLaury says $4; Dr. Shepherd authorized the committee to call on him for $5; W. F. Porter, of Philadelphia, says put him down for $1; William Rowe, of Jersey City, writes, "I desire to contribute my mite." There is no doubt but that a sufficient sum will be subscribed to guarantee a magnificent reception.

Controversial Correspondents.

Lovers of Materio-Spiritualistic controversy will be especially pleased with this and the last two or three issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, Mr. E. A. Chapman criticises Mr. M. Babcock on his method of "canning spirits," and gently admonishes him that there may be such a thing as bigotry among Materialists calling themselves Liberals. Mr. Babcock ably defends himself against the implication, and avows that he is in favor of the fullest freedom and the utmost fairness. Here the case of these two gentlemen rests up to date. Mr. Gorsuch next takes up the pen, making a very able defense of Materialism from a scientific standpoint. He is, however, immediately taken to task by Mr. A. Allen Noe, who, in a spirit of brotherly love, chastises him rather smartly. Again, Mr. Cochrane, in a friendly letter, assumes a position between Prof. Denton's belief in an "infinite spirit" and the Atheist's "dead matter." He believes in neither. Mr. Naumann, a German friend, writing in the same department of the paper, disbelieves in spirits because "there are none," and attributes the peculiar powers of spiritual mediums to "antrophognosticism," which charge few Spiritualists will feel called upon to resent. But perhaps the most severe and caustic writer on either side of the question is Mr. Charles J. Herbold. He scouts Spiritualism, and will hav none of it. He accepts the truce and aid of believers in that absurdity for the nonce until the common enemy is vanquished, after which it will be war to the knife between him and them. One thing is observable throughout this whole discussion: all couch their arguments in gentlemanly and unoffending terms, and it is the opinions only of the disputants that are at variance. We trust this may be preserved. We giv both sides of the questions involved, in order that whoever may feel aggrieved at attacks upon their belief by one correspondent may find consolation and redress by reading the more congenial arguments of one of their own school in another column.

THE Ithaca Liberal League has withdrawn its connection with the National Liberal League and changed its name to Radical Club of Tompkins County. We are sorry the members had not the moral courage to oppose popular opinion if they were in the right; but perhaps somebody's bread and butter depended on it, and so we will bid them good-bye, hoping that some time we shall see them back and that the time will come when the Club will hav the stamina to "commit itself for or against any purely religious or theological views."

The Rational Appeal is the name of a new Liberal paper published by S. B. McCracken, of Detroit, Michigan. It aims to represent the Liberal Spiritualists. It is to be a four-page sheet, at $1.10 per year. It has, the editor says, no hobbies to ride, but its purpose will be to giv expression to progressive thought. It will not become the champion, exponent, or advocate of anything but progressive thought. In view of this declaration, just what it means by "common enemy" is not apparent. If it means the church, as we suppose, then we do not see why it is not a Liberal paper. As such we place it on our exchange list with the pleasure which it gives us to know the cause is spreading.

To the Friends of the Liberal League Movement.

A year ago I requested the friends of the Liberal League movement to contribute something to aid me in my work as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League. Since then I hav received donations from various friends amounting to $111.10.

If I do my duty for the next year as chairman of that committee I shall be compelled to devote my whole time to the work. This I cannot do unless those who are interested in the movement will aid me. A very small sum from each person interested will carry me and my family through the next year. My Liberal friends, I leave this matter with you. If you will sustain me in my labors for the coming year I promise you I will do much more than I ever hav done before. Contributions will be acknowledged through THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator.

H. L. GREEN.

[We commend the above appeal of Bro. Green to the earnest consideration of our readers. He is in every way worthy of support, and cannot be too generously rewarded by the Liberal public. Our cause has no firmer friend, no stancher advocate, no more indefatigable worker in its best interests, than H. L. Green.—ED. T. S.]

A Book for the Parents of Babies.

The baby, it is generally admitted, is a factor indispensable to the acquisition of a family. How to keep him healthy, then, and good-natured, should be the first concern of every enterprising father and mother. To this great end a little pamphlet has been prepared by William H. Price, M.D., Ex. A.A. Surgeon, U. S. A., entitled "Baby's Guide to Health," and designed to forestall the services of a physician by teaching parents the means of prevention, at least in some of its details, that they may not afterwards hav occasion to require the means of cure. "Proper clothing, feeding, ventilation, cleanliness, exercise," etc., says the author, "and the non-use of domestic and patent medicines and drug remedies generally, unless clearly indicated and ordered by a physician, will do more towards promoting and preserving the health of children, and actually saving their lives, when jeopardized by diseases, than the indiscriminate and thoughtless administration of deleterious drugs and patent nostrums." The Doctor then goes on to tell how these matters of proper clothing, feeding, etc., are to be accomplished, the beauty of his subscriptions being that most of them can be filled without going to the drug-store. He condemns everywhere the use of narcotics, nor does he neglect to fire a passing shot at the generally-recognized panacea for all infantile ills, "Mrs. Somebody's Soothing Syrup." In closing his work the author remarks to the reader: "If I hav given you any new ideas that will, if properly used, save even the suffering and life of one child, and the pangs of a broken-hearted parent, then the object and purpose of this pamphlet will be fully accomplished, and my labors more than compensated." That he will reap more than this compensation must be the impression of all who read his book.

The pamphlet is published by the author at 25 cents per copy, and is for sale at this office.

"Family Creeds."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A man who writes a heterodox novel or romance, will, as a rule, find the press, as yet, rather shy in noticing his production, and rather inclined to injure it with faint praise, even should it be a book of real merit, than do simple justice to the author. Indeed, strange as it may appear, I hav also found some Liberals, who, for reasons best known to themselves, are particularly chary of their commendations, either remaining silent, or giving but a stinted measure of praise for a co-worker who has declined the higher and more profitable fields of literature in order to mellow by gentle means the rugged and stubborn soil of superstition. The author of a heterodox romance must expect no favor from the religious press, but when the independent reviewer of a secular publication speaks out boldly in words of honest approval it must be peculiarly gratifying to a writer who, under the cover of interesting fiction, will present truths which, to a large number, would scarcely be acceptable in any other form.

The Liberal press has, however, been very generous to such authors—the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER, particularly so—and I feel that I shall not be trespassing in requesting the insertion of this letter, with two recent notices of Mr. McDonnell's latest work, his heterodox romance entitled, "Family Creeds." MRS. ——.

The following complimentary notice of the new heterodox romance, "Family Creeds," is from the National, of Toronto, Canada, of February 28, 1880: "In his present work Mr. McDonnell well sustains his reputation as an author which he has won by his former works. 'Family Creeds' is a romance, not of an exciting character, yet full of thrilling interest, which is well sustained till the close of one of the most delightful stories which it has ever been our good fortune to peruse. The plot is simple and natural; not a single incident is strained for the purpose of effect beyond what one could expect in real life. Yet with these simple and delightfully natural materials a story is constructed which rivets the attention and enlists the sympathy of the reader. Much has been said and written on the question of whether fiction with an object, or which is designed to teach some lesson, is to be preferred to fiction which aims simply to amuse and please; and we suppose the result must long remain a drawn battle; but 'Family Creeds' will certainly add greatly to the strength of the cause of fiction with an object; for while the lesson the author has in view is ever present to the reader, the story itself is never allowed to suffer for the purpose of making a point in favor of the lesson. Mr. McDonnell's object is to teach the lesson of liberality and religious intolerance, and he has done so most effectually, while at the same time he has clothed his object in a most pleasingly interesting romance. The author of 'Family Creeds' must be awarded the honor of being the ablest Canadian writer of fiction, and we hope this is not the last we will hear of him as an author."

Another from the Canadian Monthly and National Review for February, 1880: "It will be well for the world when it learns what this thoughtful book proposes to teach—that the jangle of creeds tends to human misery. Whoever reads the work will doubt of ever finding comfort or an object to liv for in the profession or defense of theological dogmas unrelieved by the spirit of Christianity."

Disciples of Ingersoll.—Why is This Thus?—Thanks to the Editor and Others.—Gods and Doctors of God.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I had concluded to rest my pen for a long time, so far as your columns are concerned, because you hav such an abundance of able correspondents that my feeble pen don't seem to be at all required. But I want to ventilate a thought or two that is awakened by reading an able "Open Letter to B. F. Underwood," by George Lynn, of Illinois, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 28th, just past.

Mr. Lynn very correctly says that it was Spiritualism that made it possible for Ingersoll and Underwood to be received by the people, and is it not a little humiliating to hear the old pioneers of Freethought and progress now dubbed

"DISCIPLES OF INGERSOLL?"

Preachers and churchmen now call all Freethinkers "Disciples of Ingersoll." I wonder if they hav forgotten the tiny raps at Hydeville, thirty-five years ago, and I wonder if all intelligent people do not know that Andrew Jackson Davis, Joel Tiffany, Judge Edmonds, Mrs. Britt, Cora Hatch, Warren Chase, Prof. Brittan, Thomas Gales Forster, Furgeson, Pardee, Denton, Peebles, Emma Hardinge, Mrs. Hizer Mayhew, Doctors Child, Gardner, Buchanan, and thousands more under spirit influence throughout this land, were the pioneers of Freethought? And that those raps hav since reached the antipodes and are still resounding from pole to pole?

Andrew Jackson Davis' pen did more to liberate the human mind than Col. Ingersoll's tongue ever can do. And Thomas Paine said he loved to work for no pay save to do good. No, Mr. Preachers and others, we are not disciples of Ingersoll, but rather it is he that is reaping a harvest of fame by reason of the work we had done to prepare the way long before he came to the light of Freethought, and I think it is safe to say that he has not got clearly out of the shell yet. For while the noble Bennett, Wright, Green, Jamieson, Parton, Walker, Hull, York, Leland, Professor and Mrs. Denton, Post, Fox, Campfield, Boardman, Rawson, Palmer, Mrs. Lake, Mrs. Dr. Severance, Mrs. Slenker, O. K. Smith, Colby, Graves, Roberts, Flower, Bell, and a host of others, are nobly working heart and soul for the cause, the popular Colonel seems to stand out for big admittance fees, and a political chance. Or else,

HOW IS THIS THUS?

How does it happen that we read with such gladness from the reports of Ingersoll's utterances at Cincinnati that the rich man, the usurper, having in the near future to be obliged to tell where he gets his immense wealth, and what he is going to do with it, or something to that effect, and that children to be hereafter born were not to find every spot on the earth pre-empted. That he had enlisted for the cause for all time, and that he would wait for the next world for any office he might want, etc.

Next we hear of Underwood deriding that Cincinnati affair through the Chicago Inter-Ocean, and right after Ingersoll cooing in with the Republicans, telling them that Blaine is his first choice, and Grant his second, while it is known to us all that the Republican party is the absolute ally of wealth and ecclesiasticism as opposed to the struggling millions.

I rejoice at the strides Freethought and human progress are making, and feel to thank all of the noble workers for the cause of humanity throughout the land, when I read of them in every fresh TRUTH SEEKER.

That is right, friends; let us keep the ball rolling. Let us, agreeing to disagree upon all minor subjects, present a solid front to the common foe, for he is insolent, and is now hourly plotting to cut short our liberties and those of our children.

I wish to congratulate the management upon the excellence of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It was never so good as it has been the last few months. It comes laden with noble sentiments and precious gems of thought, from week to week. No paper could be more Liberal, more ably conducted, or hav a more able corps of writers. And I wish to thank you, Mr. Editor, for making use of quotations when you hav occasion to mention eminent "divines" like Crosby, Joe Cook, etc., "divines," gods!—while others are only doctors of divinity, doctors of God. Some of our Liberal writers forget to use the quotations when writing of the eminent "divines," which seems to me like paying homage.

Fraternally, DR. ANDREWS.

Kipton, Ohio, March 3, 1880.

SKEPTICISM OF ROBERT BURNS.—Ye venerable sages and holy flamens, is there probability in your conjectures, truth in your stories of another world beyond death, or are they all alike, baseless visions and fabricated fables? If there is another life it must be for the just, the benevolent, the amiable, and the humane. What a flattering idea, then, is a world to come! Would to God I as firmly believed as I ardently wished it!

If there be any truth in the orthodox faith of these churches, I am d——d past redemption, and what is worse, d——d to all eternity. I am deeply read in Boston's fourfold state. Marshall on Scantification, Guthries' Trial of a Saving Interest, etc., but "there is no balm in Gilead, there is no physician there" for me.

All my fears and cares are of this world. If there is another an honest man has nothing to fear from it. I hate a man that wishes to be a Deist, but I fear every fair unprejudiced inquirer must in some degree be a skeptic.

The subject is so involved in darkness that we want data to go upon.—Extracts from Burns' letters.

"Bible and Flag."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Scranton (Pa.) Republican of a recent date publishes a sermon delivered at Hyde Park, Pa., on the 22d of February, upon the character of Washington. Like all the rest of the reverend gentlemen who occupy the "coward's castle" on Sundays, and there make such statements as they please, because no one is allowed to say a word in opposition, the Rev. Eckman undertook to make his yahoo audience believe that George Washington was a saint. Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York, in his commemorative service on the same day, and on the same subject says—what all the contemporaries of Washington and all readers of history know—that when provoked, as he often was, he swore fearfully. But we must remember that the merit of his oaths was that they were all uttered in the interest of patriotism, liberty, and virtue. There was more real piety in one of Washington's well-rounded oaths—such, for instance, as he delivered against General Lee at the battle of Princeton—than there is in a hundred prayers delivered by Bro. Beecher, Bro. Cowley, the Rev. Dr. Dry-as-dust, or the Rev. Dr. Cream-cheese.

Mr. Eckman asks with emotion, "Who would not delight in being an American—to liv under the Stars and Stripes, pinned beneath the cross of Christ, where Bible and flag go hand in hand?" If the Rev. pulpiteer were an intelligent man, and not a liar, as so many of the clergy are, he would know, and would hav told his hearers, that the Constitutional Convention, which was presided over by George Washington, and which produced the Constitution and government under which we liv, had no prayers during all the sixteen months it was in session, and that there is not one word or syllable in its text which contains even the recognition of a God, of a Sabbath, of the existence of Christianity, or any other religion. The reason is that the leading men who formed this instrument were all what Mr. Eckman would now call Infidels. Washington, Paine, Jefferson, Madison, Franklin, and nearly all who rendered eminent service in the field, in legislation, and diplomacy, were Deists and unbelievers in the Bible as a revelation from heaven. To these men we owe the fact that no religionist of any kind—Jew, Catholic, or Protestant—ever has been persecuted for his creed. Every Christian government on earth has shed the blood of the Jews. This government alone never did so, because the framers of the Constitution and the makers of the laws under it were Infidels, who did not believe in the Bible as an infallible revelation from heaven, but who did believe that what we call faith is an involuntary act of the mind, modified by the amount of light on the subject which the mind sees; and that therefore no man should be punished for his religious opinions.

But the fact which settles the question forever as to the relation which the Stars and Stripes sustained to "the cross of Christ," and which proves that the emblem of our nationality cannot be "pinned" beneath the emblem of any religion, is the treaty with Tripoli, ratified when Washington was President, Jefferson Secretary of State, and when the Cabinet and Senate were composed of men who had taken part in forming the Constitution, and understood all its provisions. The government of Tripoli was Mohammedan in religion, and was naturally jealous and watchful lest, in their commercial intercourse with us, difficulty would grow out of the subject of religion. To remove all apprehensions of this kind, the declaration is solemnly made in the eleventh article of the treaty, by the United States, as one of the high contracting parties, that "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." It knows no God, no Bible, no Sabbath, no clergyman. It is a purely secular institution, protecting all believers in all creeds or no creeds.

Just about the hour that brother Eckman was delivering his incoherent platitude to the workingmen of Hyde Park, and pinning the Stars and Stripes beneath the cross of Christ, the Rev. Dr. Boardman, pastor of the First Baptist church in Philadelphia, was acknowledging the secularity of the Constitution, and admitting that to introduce the Protestant Bible into the public schools is an invasion of the Constitution and of the rights of conscience, and ought not to be done. He therefore advocated the establishment everywhere of parochial schools, each sect having a system of its own.

But Brother Eckman is greatly exercised about Sabbath observance, and complains of large monopolies compelling their men to work on that holy day, "allowing them no time to pray." He wants every one to go to church on Sunday, and hear the self-styled embassadors of Jesus Christ urging sinners to repent, and be saved from hell-fire, although Beecher and Canon Farrar hav knocked a hole in the bottom and poured a whole Niagara of water into it. But does not the gentleman understand that neither the American Sabbath nor the Scotch Sabbath, nor the Popish Sabbath is the one required to be observed by the Sabbath law of the Bible? The Bible says distinctly that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." All the sects of the Christian church, therefore, break the law by making the first day of the week to be the Sabbath, when no act was ever passed by the law-giver repealing the one given on Sinai that the seventh day was the Sabbath. Then, after appointing the day by a positive and unchangeable enactment, the law-giver goes on to say: "In it, the seventh day, thou shalt do no manner of work; thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger within thy gates." So strictly kept and so remorselessly executed was this law when in force upon the Jews in Palestine that it was a capital offense for a man to gather sticks and make a fire to boil his pot of victuals on that holy day. This is the Sabbath law, as given by the law-giver himself, and is irrepealable by those it binds. And yet we will wager a pint of Croton water that on the morning of the very day that Bro. Eckman made his plea for the Sabbath, and enjoined its observance on his hearers, he ate a cooked breakfast of mutton-chops, flap-jacks, and hot coffee. Of course they were cooked by fire, and therefore a clear violation of the law. And let us tell Bro. Eckman that if the law-giver had sent his officer to arrest him on Monday morning, and send him to execution by a summary process, he could not hav put Bridget, the maid, between himself and his fate, and say, in the language of his illustrious predecessor in the Garden of Eden, "The woman which thou hast given" us to serve in our kitchen, she gave me the flap-jacks, and I did eat.

Besides, the Sabbath among the Jews was simply a day of rest, and as such we prize it still. It was not a day of worship, as we make it; and if Bro. Eckman livs in the country and hitches up his horse ("cattle") to toil up and down hill in carrying him to church, he is a violator of the law, and would hav been put to death as such had he been a Jew in Palestine when the law was binding. The law says, as we observed before: "In it [the Sabbath] thou shalt do no manner of work;" and we are not going to let Bro. Eckman come into the pulpit on the first instead of the seventh day of the week, as the law requires; and, his own true inwardness being "with good capon lined," urge upon us poor devils in the pews, who hav to work so hard for our living, the observance of a law which he violated that morning, and which he intends to violate every Sunday of his life.

But Bro. Eckman's righteous soul is distressed over the polygamy of the Mormons in Utah territory. What would the clergy, and especially the Methodist ministers, do without this safety-valve of the Mormons? All the Saint Josephs who do not leave the skirts of their garments in the hands of the Mrs. Potiphars (see Genesis, xxxix) atone for violating their own standard of morals by hurling their anathemas upon the poor Mormons of Utah. When Parson Newman, Grant's Methodist confessor, went to Salt Lake City to debate the question of polygamy with Orson Pratt, he found out, what he might hav known without telling, that polygamy is an institution of the Old Testament, and was not forbidden in the New; and that the American missionaries in oriental countries, where this form of marriage prevails, admit converts to their churches who hav as many wives as they please. Yet, with this fact before their eyes, the Methodist clergy at home are forever denouncing the Mormons for having more wives than one each, and in this respect resembling Old Testament saints, who are held up as models in the writings of the New Testament.

The most sagacious man who ever lived, and understood human nature from crown to sole and from center to circumference, says, in the "Timon of Athens:"

> "Strike me the counterfeit matron;
> It is her habit only that is honest;
> Herself's a bawd;"

implying that prudes, who are so zealous in their wish to burn with fire all frail sisters who enjoy love and lovers, are not actuated by a real love of purity, but by motives of envy, and to preserve an immaculateness of character in the estimation of the public which they do not really possess. So we cannot interpret the motives of the Comstock school of Methodist ministers, in their eternal diatribes against the Mormons, in any other way than that they envy the Mormons the privilege they enjoy in having harems, where they can hav as many wives as they please. The newspapers teem with accounts of clergymen, especially Methodists, preaching up chastity vehemently on Sunday as a branch of Christian morality, and then going among the families of their charge and assisting poor husbands in the performance of the marital duties, or playing the part of a shepherd among the ewe lambs of their flocks; for, of all the sheep of the Lord's pasture, no flock has in it so many scallawags as the one called Methodist. During the antislavery struggle the meanest dogs of the whole pack that the slaveholders set on the Abolitionists were Methodist ministers, North and South. They are playing the same game now in vilifying the advocates of the holy cause of intellectual freedom, when the whole world knows that there is no body of Christian professors which is so thoroughly corrupt and hypocritical as the Methodist church. The Cleveland (Ohio) Leader of the 21st of November last publishes the report of the directors of the Ohio Penitentiary, in which is announced the noteworthy fact that of the 1,316 criminals in that institution the Catholics number 133; the Baptists, 65; the Presbyterians, 53; the Episcopalians, 33; the Campbellite Baptists, 18, and the Methodists, 173. The orthodox churches hav the largest representation among the criminals of Ohio; the heretical churches hav the least, while the Spiritualists and Infidels hav no representation at all. Yet, notwithstanding all these facts, the clergy hav the stupendous impudence and brazen-facedness to stand up in their pulpits and denounce the radicals of the country with practicing a low standard of morality!

When in England, in 1840, I saw one of the Egyptian idols in the British Museum. Some one of our company said, "Well, they don't admit that they worship such ugly images as this; they look through and beyond this to one great supreme power." "They were scarcely more idolatrous," I answered, "than our friends when they read their Bible with such reverence last evening." They brought it with great solemnity, and laid it on the lap of the one who was to read it and he bowed before it and then opened it and read it in what we Friends call the preaching tone. The passages read were those that had no particular bearing upon the conduct of those then present, nor upon the special occasion that had brought us together; but it was "the Bible" and "scripture," and a chapter of it must be read in order, and in a solemn tone. I said to the friend who was pointing out this idol to me in the museum, that the worship of that image was like the worship of the Bible, as we had observed it the evening before. To me that was the worship of an idol.—Lucretia Mott.

The Braden-Jamieson Debate at Salem, Ill.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Last spring W. F. Jamieson gave a few lectures in this place, in which he stated that he did not know that there was a God. If any one knew there was one, he said, come up into the stand and tell what they know about him. They should hav one-half of the time and fair treatment. No one would accept the offer, although there were a number of clergymen present, who make it their business to tell the people they know all about him. No one would accept the offer. He left a challenge to anybody who was in good standing in the church. Six came forward and accepted the offer, to wit, two Presbyterians, two Methodists, one Baptist, and one Campbellite. Each one appointed a committeeman to see and guard the interests of their church.

The Catholics, believing that discretion was the better part of valor, kept their shutters closed, not daring to expose their air-castle to the shell and hot shot which they well knew Mr. Jamieson would rain upon them, for fear they would get their windows broken.

The subject to be discussed was the inspiration of the Bible and its tendency over other theological questions. Elder Clark Braden, of the Disciple church, accepted the offer. Rules for regulating and governing the debate were agreed upon by the parties. The debate was to continue for twelve evenings, and to occupy two hours each evening. Each party was to make two speeches of thirty minutes, and to ask as many questions as they pleased, which the other was bound to answer without equivocation.

The church committee chose two moderators, and they chose the third. Dr. D. K. Green was chosen, a man well qualified and versed in parliamentary rules, and most nobly and honorably did he perform his duty. I was a spectator, not understanding the religious views of either of the disputants, and will giv a brief history of the discussion as it appeared to me from my standpoint.

The debate was held in the Court House, a large and spacious room, which was jammed full. Mr. Braden occupied the stand all the time, Mr. Jamieson only when speaking. Mr. Jamieson spoke in a loud, clear, and distinct voice, so all could hear him. Mr. Braden wrote his arguments and answers in advance. Sometimes they hit the subject, and sometimes he would not touch it in his half hour's speech. At times his voice was pitched so high that it was disagreeably unpleasant, and at other times, sitting crouched behind the desk, he would answer in an undertone so low that he could not be heard except by those who were close to him. Mr. Jamieson had to repeat it so that the audience could understand the answer.

Mr. Braden said that the Mosaic account of the creation was not correct, that Adam and Eve were not the first pair, that it was poetic, that it was wrongly translated; that we had no Bible, only an imperfect translation of the Bible.

Braden said he believed in a personal God and a golden heaven; he believed in a personal devil, but not in a brimstone hell. In one case Braden refused to answer, saying that Jamieson had so framed his question as to make him seemingly tell a lie. Jamieson quoted that passage which says, Unless ye hate father, mother, etc., ye cannot be my disciples. Braden said hate meant love. He denied that polygamy was taught or practiced in the Bible, and said that wife meant woman after he had one. In answer to a question he said a man might lie, steal, rob, and murder for sixty-nine years, months, weeks, days, and hours, then if he sincerely repented and said, Lord hav mercy on my soul, that he was sure of salvation only one hour before his death. Braden told Jamieson to speak up like a little man. He read from Livingstone's travels in Africa to prove the honesty of some of the tribes in the interior. Braden said it was false. Jamieson quoted from Huxley and Spencer. Braden repeated the names backward and forward a number of times over as a schoolboy would the multiplication table. He acted as though he had found some strange name that he wished to commit to memory, for which he was vociferously cheered by his followers as one of the best arguments he had produced. Braden frequently told Jamieson that he uttered nonsense, that it was false, that it was balderdash. He at times was very boisterous, the moderator, having to enforce the rules, would check him to keep him within the bounds of decency. Braden said the Bible was written by ignorant barbarians, who knew nothing of science, that 70,000 meant only 70.

I hav noticed only a few of his new translations of the Bible for fear I should make this article too long. A short article copied from the Mount Vernon News, with the comments of the editor of the Advocate, led me to make a short statement of the debate. Mr. Jamieson quoted twenty or thirty passages from the Bible, giving both chapter and verse. Mr. Braden followed and said that Mr. Jamieson had given a long list of quotations, but never told where to find one of them.

The report came here from abroad that Mr. Braden was partially insane. He did but little to remove that impression.

The Advocate says, "As a Bible debater Elder Clark Braden has no superior upon American soil. And we doubt if the cities or hamlets of the worlds can produce a greater." He reminds me of a man who went to hear a political speaker and remarked, "He is a d——d smart fellow, for he thinks just as I do." The editor says, "For the last seven nights, as soon as his person was visible at the outer door, cheering would commence and continue until he reached the stand." It seemed that the cheering, like his speeches, was all arranged beforehand. Fuglemen were posted for the purpose. Braden would wait until the house was filled. One night he was fifteen minutes late. The moderator told him that he must come to time, that they would not wait for him.

Braden said Jamieson had been slobbering over the audience, and patting the moderator on the back. The cheering was a disgrace. There were many little girls occupying front seats, who ought to hav been in their little beds, clapping and cheering, who were totally ignorant of the subject, and who were placed there to cheer and keep their courage up, like the boy that whistles in the dark.

The editor of the Advocate says, "If the News is laboring under the delusion that Clark Braden wields a little theological club, he is underrating him." Braden said D. M. Bennett was an obscene, bad man, and ought to be in the penitentiary. Braden did not know the history of the most infamous trial, or else he well knew that he was uttering a wilful falsehood before an audience, the greater portion of which never heard of Bennett only through the lying lips of some depraved specimen of humanity. Bennett's name will stand high on the wall of fame, when his wicked persecutors are forgotten in the dust. Braden's theological club that he brags about is composed of feathers. It is nothing but a shoo-fly.

Mr. Jamieson told Mr. Braden that he had enjoyed this debate finely. He hoped to meet him in debate again. No response. Mr. Jamieson said he wanted this debate published—that he would furnish his notes and pay one-half of the expense. Would he do the same? Braden said, No, he could not do it; was not able.

The closing scene was a disgraceful one. They shouted, stamped, and hallooed. If they had had more civilization and less of false religion, it would hav been much more creditable to all concerned. Amid much noise and confusion Mr. Jamieson was presented with a beautiful and costly pitcher, accompanied with a very elegant presentation speech from a lady. They also presented Braden with an old song-book, said to hav been written by one Solomon, containing a vast amount of obscenity, which ought never to hav been printed. I hav attended many political meetings, but never saw such a disgraceful scene before. The moderator said it was a d——d mob. They say they gained a great victory. A general was complimented on a great victory he had gained. He replied: "Yes; one more such and I am ruined." Yes, a few more such victories, and old musty theology is dead in Salem.

Now, Brother Bennett, I wish you to bear your misfortunes with heroic valor; as you hav thus far, about sixty days more, and you will again taste the sweets of liberty; and oh, how I wish I could be one of the happy friends to meet you and congratulate you that you hav escaped with your life, for if they had the power you would hav been burnt at the stake.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best religious paper I read, and I hope you will continue to edit it until you wipe out error and priestcraft. URIAH MILLS.

The Injustice of Some Laws.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The accident of your incarceration, under the statutes of the United States, should be used to enlighten the people of all the Union to the iniquitous and very remarkable feature in our system of taking accused persons away from their counties for trial, and often away from their states, and obliging them to advance the money to pay for all costs and fees of witnesses, U. S. marshals, and deputies, in order to defend themselves, and to the further remarkable fact of their never being repaid for such expenditures. Under state laws the accused is tried at home, or where the offense was charged as committed, and he is furnished with his witnesses at the state's expense. Under the United States statutes he is carried possibly a thousand miles from where he is known; he must pay his traveling expenses home, and those of his securities on bail bond, his witnesses, their board, mileage, and that of the officers who summon them. Thus if one is accused of having sold a pound or so of tobacco, or of having failed to use or erase a stamp on a draft or check, or on a box or barrel or package when required, or of having committed or tried to commit a fraud on the United States, or charged over ten dollars as claim agent, etc., hundreds of statutable offenses, he is taken to some far distant United States court, say it is three hundred miles from his home. Now to avoid going to jail he must carry two bondsmen, which at three cents per mile, and a dollar per day for expenses, say six days' cost, will amount to forty-eight dollars. Add his own expenses back home, say in all twenty dollars. Then he must appear for trial, with say two witnesses, as to facts, and say five as to character of prosecuting witness, as these are generally spite cases, and the witness a disreputable person. This will cost not less than one hundred and fifty dollars. Here is the simplest case, which if promptly tried will cost over two hundred dollars besides lawyer's fees, loss of time, and injury to business. Say you are successful, say the judge has ordered the jury to acquit, for in these courts they are very arbitrary, and juries act with fear and trembling; they too are far from home and pliant tools. Oh, such courts! They are under heaven's eye a dire mockery of justice. As I once heard a grand juror, a most intelligent gentlemen, say, "The very air smells there of blood." Acquitted, innocent, what a calamity has befallen you! No repayment, not one cent! Thousands of good citizens hav been thus ruined. Other thousands are blackmailed. In many parts of the North the people know nothing of this, but 'tis in the South that this wretched system feeds fat the officers and spies that batten on it.

Really it is about time some of them should learn all about it. HOLT.

Eternal Vigilance is the Price of Liberty!

In Union is Strength.—Prove all Things, and Hold Fast the Good.—Free Rostrum, Free Speech, Free Press, Secular and Compulsory Education, Church Taxation, and Equal Rights without Regard to Sex are the Mottoes Upon our Flag.

CIRCULAR OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE MICHIGAN STATE ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS AND LIBERALISTS.

Four years ago, without my seeking, I was elected to the Presidency of the State Association of Spiritualists, which two years afterward changed its name to Spiritualists and Liberalists. At that time chaos reigned in all forms of Spiritual and Liberal thought, as far as any definite organic action was concerned; no regular missionaries were engaged; but two or three places in the state kept up any regular meetings, and a general apathy existed.

Since that time I hav devoted my best energies, time, and money to bring together and into action all those as speakers and workers who dare to identify themselves with the Association as Spiritualists or Liberalists. Noble men and women with united sacrifices hav come into the work in addition to those previously engaged; the state Society has become legally organized, many more are on the verge of organization, some twenty speakers hav been constantly at work in the state during the last year. Large annual, semi-annual, and quarterly meetings hav been held, with a successful ten days' camp-meeting, and many important grove-meetings. Half-fare permits hav been obtained for our speakers over nearly all the railroads. A permanent camp-ground has been located at Goguac Lake, with a stock company of fifty thousand dollars; a competent man has been secured to raise the stock; much of the same is already taken; eighty acres of the finest land, with the most delightful scenery, is to be purchased, buildings to be built, grounds cultivated, and the finest camp-ground and pleasure-resort in the state pefected. These are a few of the primary steps which hav been taken during the last four years to attempt to organize, centralize, and utilize the forces of Spiritualism and Liberalism.

The small beginnings show us plainly that all that is needed is to continue in well-doing. The period of destruction, of tearing down, is well nigh past, the time has come that if we hav any principles, any beautiful philosophy, we should organize to teach, and unite society upon that basis. If Spiritualism and Liberalism is better for humanity and society than old dogma and priesthood, let us show it by building, teaching, and doing better things. In this, as in all other organic methods, we hav foes without and foes within, to tear asunder and block the wheels of progress; some moved by jealousy, envy, and selfishness, others by cowardice, bigotry, or ignorance. For the last few months some parties hav made mighty efforts, in a secret way, to break up the union and harmony of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists. The excuses, fault-finding, and methods exercised hav been various, and the chief workers in that direction hav been those outside of the Association, parties who hav never united or assisted in any way, either by money or labor. These things hav produced no effect upon the majority of the speakers, officers, or members of the state Association, and only those who hav lacked the elements of firmness and devotion to the cause through ill as well as good report hav been moved.

Now, my friend, your name has been given me as a Spiritualist or Liberalist, and I send you this circular, that you may know that your presence, sympathy, vote, voice, and money are needed now, at our annual meeting, to place this cause upon a safe and firm foundation. The masses are tired and sick at heart with the food which orthodox Christianity gives them; their reason rejects it, and their best convictions and heart-throbs ask for spiritual light, growth, and immortality, without priest or dogma. There are hundreds of Spiritualists and Liberalists who, when they get away from the fear of hell, and from under the ban of priestcraft, feel they hav no duties, and from that standpoint relapse into a do-nothingness. To my mind, they hav greater duties and more to stimulate them to action than ever.

Remember that every liberty, human right, and noble blessing which we hav the pleasure of enjoying has cost the lives, thoughts, energies, and sacrifices of those that hav lived before us. Will you put on the armor, show your colors, and, in the broad spirit of true Spiritualism and Liberalism, assist the faithful workers to maintain a free rostrum, restoring united action and a propagandism that shall defeat, teach, liberate, and spiritualize the combined hosts of bigotry, superstition, and churchianity? Many friends of our cause will wait until the last days of the Convention, thinking that those sessions will be the most instructive and entertaining. Such will not be the case at the present session. The most important business will occur on the first days of the meeting, and as over thirty speakers, including visiting clergymen and speakers, will be present, the speeches, will be as fine the first as last day. The meeting will commence Wednesday afternoon at 2 P. M., March 24th, and, if possible, close on Monday night, March 29th. Reduced railroad rates hav been secured from 22nd to 31st.

The afternoon session, Wednesday, will be reports of Secretary, Treasurer, and missionaries, with short speeches. Wednesday evening an address by the President upon the subject, "The State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists," when the following points will be discussed:

1. Its history, trials, failures, and successes.
2. How organized; its objects, principles, methods, aims, and present condition.
3. Do you favor the union of Spiritualists and Liberalists for business and organic purposes? The opinions of the people over the state, and the pros and cons of the subject, will be presented.
4. Do we need a society of Spiritualists alone, with that one idea of spirit phenomena and philosophy, in order to successfully teach, defend, and protect Spiritualism against Materialism?
5. Do we as a state Society need the organization of Liberal Leagues, as long as we hav indorsed and are defending and teaching all the principles of the League? Is it not the duty of Spiritualists to work with Leagues where such are organized, and no Spiritual society exists? Should not those in sympathy with Leagues work with and unite with societies of Spiritualists and Liberalists, where no Leagues are organized?
6. How shall we more successfully carry on missionary work, organize societies, and support laborers?
7. How shall the Mutual Insurance Association, which has been organized by and through the energies of some of our earnest workers, be made practical, safe investment, and an honor to our cause?
8. How shall we protect our mediums, magnetic healers, and clairvoyant physicians, who hav no diplomas from medical colleges, from medical bigotry and persecution?
9. What may, can, and ought to be the future of our Association, and the way to arrive at the same.

THURSDAY MORNING, 9 A. M.

Report of Committee on Credentials, followed by report of Committee on Membership.

We hav now become a legally organized and representative body, with delegates from local societies and members alone entitled to vote. It is important that as many as possible be present at the beginning of the session. Any person may become a member by signing the articles of association, or authorizing the same to be done, and paying a membership fee of one dollar. Either come, or send your dollar and name.

THURSDAY MORNING, 10 A. M.

Election of officers for the ensuing year.

There will be no printed programme beyond this point, but the Executive Board will meet at the close of each session, and arrange order of business and order of speeches for the next day. Persons expecting to speak will need to be present, or else inform by letter when they will be, that the Board may arrange to do justice to all interests and persons.

The following railroad rates will be given all parties desiring to attend the Convention: Northwestern Grand Trunk R. R. All agents between Port Huron and Chicago will be instructed to sell special return tickets to Battle Creek to parties desiring to attend the state Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists. Tickets will be good March 22d to April 1st, inclusive; rate, two cents per mile each way.

Grand Rapids & Indiana R. R will sell return tickets to delegates for 1⅓ fare from March 22d to 31st. Certificates furnished by writing to the President or Secretary.

Michigan Central R. R. will make rate of two cents per mile each way, from March 22d to 31st.

Chicago and West Michigan R R. All persons attending the meeting will pay full fare on going, and one cent per mile on return, if members of State Association, with Secretary's indorsement.

Flint & P. M. R. R. Round trip tickets at the rate of two cents per mile. Reduced hotel rates at Battle Creek, during the Convention. Potter House, $1.25 per day; American, $1.00 per day; meals, under Opera House, at all hours, 15 cents.

Some thirty Spiritual and Liberal speakers will be present, with good music from Mrs. Olie Childs Denslow and M. C. Vandercook, assisted by the Battle Creek choir.

Interest.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The question of interest is up for discussion. Joseph Wolff, in the Irish World, shows its enormity by this illustration: "In the year 1700, A, having accumulated $10,000 in business, retires and lends his money at six per cent, or enough to maintain himself, his wife, and his son B. A and his wife, at the usual age, die and leave the $10,000 to B, who, marrying, has but one child, a son, C, who also marries and has but one child, D, and so on through the alphabet, or until the end of time. The factors in the proposition are that each child falling heir to the $10,000 shall never hav a family too large to be maintained by the interest on the $10,000, and that it shall always be kept intact, always be kept at interest, and always maintain a family free from work or productive industry. The enormity of this proposition is such as to strike every man with its unbounded injustice, because the $10,000, whether stolen or honestly earned in the year 1700, has kept at least two men working continuously from then until now, and will forever, to pay eternally for the use of that sum that was earned but once. And yet, if interest at any rate per cent is right, then A and his descendants forever can rightfully thus rob labor to allow them to liv in idleness. If I am not right in this conclusion, I will thank some defender of the infamy to correct me." In the same paper, says James Sindser: "Suppose a man performs a day's work and receives therefor one dollar; thereafter he is idle, and as a matter of common sense and equity, receives nothing. But the dollar, which is esteemed by economists and those who render idol-worship to the god of gold, to be greater than the man, is placed at interest, and, compounded at the rate of ten per cent for 100 years, amounts to the incredible sum of $13,800. This sum it would require two men, each working nearly twenty-five years to earn." Who can get around these facts? They cannot be surmounted or belittled.

Letters from Friends.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 22, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: The feeling which exists in this city against Thomas Paine is something astonishing. They refuse to patronize news-stands where I hav put his books on sale, though they make no objection to Ingersoll's. It is all ignorance, I suppose, and owing to the terrible malignity with which he has been pursued by the church; nevertheless the books shall be sold in one way and another.

The ideas of Ingersoll, Underwood, Prof. Denton, and I might add Huxley, in regard to dead matter, are so ridiculous as compared with their profound researches in other directions that I must here say a few words. "When life first existed upon this earth," says Prof. Denton, in a late letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Cannot Prof. Denton see that matter and life are so existent that you cannot find an atom of matter that is not alive, that it was as much alive when it was a molten mass as it is to-day? Cannot these scientists see that mineral life, vegetable life, animal life, and spiritual life melt and blend into each other as do the colors of the rainbow? What I mean by spiritual life are the highest known qualities of matter. What chemists call chemical action is only a lower form of vital action. Prof. Denton, in his lectures on astronomy, says that this world will go back into the sun. A more absurd idea was never perpetrated by mortal man. It can no more go back into the sun—from which I know it came—than the sun, which is the child of a greater sun, can go back into its mother. The Professor also speaks in your paper of an "infinite spirit." That is the Indian idea, and I hear it so often from Spiritualist lecturers that I am moved to ask, What is an infinite spirit? and what part of space does he, she, or it occupy? When people talk about infinite and finite, material and immaterial, spirit and matter, it seems to me that if they would look well into their subjects they would learn that what is infinite to-day is finite to-morrow, what is spirit to-day is matter to-morrow, and they would cease to make distinctions which hav no use except to confuse and to narrow the mind, and to stand between the longing eyes of human beings and that truth which alone can make them free.

Why take so much pains to demolish the orthodox God with all the weapons of destruction which combativeness can muster when the combatants themselves persist in setting up imaginary forts and high picket fences of ideas between the human soul and its real makers—everything that was or is or is to come?

Even Dr. Trall, the great health reformer, never forgave me for saying, when in the class-room among the students of his college, that matter was not dead. In my judgment he was, in his channel of thought, the greatest man that ever lived on this earth, and yet he had this limitation, and in his heart, if not on his lips, set down as a heretic whoever persisted in going beyond it.

I hold Prof. Denton in the highest respect, and know him to be a giant in intellect, but I will fight him and the dead Atheists as mercilessly as they fight the church whenever I find them erecting any of their finalities upon its ruins. What the orthodox do not understand they term "God" or the "devil." What the Spiritualists do not understand they term "angels" and "diakka." What the dead Atheists, scientists, Infidels, etc., do not understand, they call "dead matter," and that settles the question to their satisfaction.

In my opinion, when the unknown is termed either God or the devil, a full-fledged spirit or diakka, dead matter or the unknowable, the door which leads to progression is closed, and you sit down to shrivel to the size of your God, who is in no way a whit more respectable, more intellectual, nor more inspiring than the redoubtable old gentleman with which the Jews and Christians hav so long paralyzed the world. Giv me all eternity for time, all space for room, and the unobstructed intellect for growth. It is time that we had set our compass, that we had arranged our chart to comprehend the whole—past, present, and to come. The fool hath said in his heart, "There is no God," but a greater fool hath said, "There is a God." My God is my wife, my angels are my children, my religion is love to humanity. Unless love soon steps in to take the place of hatred, I hav but little hope for the future of the human race.

I received the instalment of books all right. Inclosed please find ten dollars, which you will please send the worth of in books. Truly yours, W. W. COCHRANE.

PARK CITY, UTAH, Feb. 18, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Even in this far and remote part of Utah territory, a country known to be peopled with Latter-Day Saints of the church of Jesus Christ, or commonly called Mormons, where the church rules in nearly all things, there yet exists a few brave men stamped with Liberalism, as the following will prove:

Last fall, through the efforts of Messrs. J. H. Lynde and James G. Watson, were gathered together, at the residence of the former, about twelve men who were willing to associate together for the purpose of forming an auxiliary Liberal League; so we applied for and procured a charter, under date of November 24, 1879, from which time we hav completed our organization and are now in full working order, with eighteen active members and the following officers: James G. Watson, President; George P. Bissonnette, Secretary; William Disc, Treasurer. We meet every two weeks, and hav very interesting debates, in which we hold our own, notwithstanding that we are young speakers as yet. There is no Abbotism in our ranks. We hav adopted the Constitution of the National Liberal League, and are working in concert of action for the accomplishment of its demands, etc. We expect to meet with better success after the winter season is over. We look with anticipation upon the expiration of Mr. D. M. Bennett's imprisonment, not only because we sympathize with him in his lonely hours behind the bars, and that his health must be declining every day, but we expect to see a great revival in the Liberal ranks after his liberation. As I understand a fund is to be created in our League for the purpose of purchasing Liberal books and tracts, to be distributed in this community, you will soon hear from us again.

Yours truly, GEO. P. BISSONNETTE.

LAKEPORT, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: As an admirer of your paper and its imprisoned editor, I feel like adding my testimony to the hosts already heard from. I liv in an out-of-the-way place, and hav no Liberal League, and but one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to this post-office. A few names were got to a petition for the old hero's pardon, but it now looks as if he would hav to stay out his sentence; but it must be gratifying to him to feel that his business is in good hands. The paper grows better. I hope when his sojourn in the state capital is at an end, his friends will giv him such a welcome home as will satisfy Comstock, Colgate & Co. that it would hav been better to let him alone, and that they hav not impaired his power to battle with superstition and tyranny. I am a Spiritualist as well as a Liberal.

Yours in opposition to superstition and oppression,

MRS. A. B. TUPPER.

TOLEDO, IOWA, Jan. 13, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I wish to say to you that all the Liberals of my acquaintance except one sympathize with D. M. Bennett.

A few years ago there was a large number of subscribers to the Index here, but there is only one copy taken now.

There is a general regret among the Liberals here in regard to that "interview" of Underwood's in the Inter-Ocean.

I am glad to see such an earnest worker as E. C. Walker in this state. I believe we hav got the right man in the right place.

I shall be glad to see the time come when all Liberals and Liberal papers will work together for the good of Liberalism, for they will certainly lose support if they do not.

I don't think it is of any use to try to commit Liberals to support any particular political party, but to work with any party that will do the most for Liberalism, locally as well as generally.

I am well pleased with the way THE TRUTH SEEKER is conducted, but I shall hail with joy the day when D. M. Bennett is liberated and takes the helm.

Let every Liberal purchase a copy or two of Paine's "Age of Reason," and get your neighbors to read them, and you will soon bring them over to Liberalism.

Respectfully yours, E. S. BECKLEY.

PARISH OF POINT COUPEE, LA., Feb. 23, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: A clergyman of this parish by the name of Broguere, who is a real debauchee, got into a little scrape a few days ago with his servant. It appears that he got on a frolic, and after having danced the cancan with some of his friends came back home overloaded, got mad for some strife, and beat his servant on the head and in the face with his buggy-whip, breaking one tooth of the woman who served him faithfully for more than eight years. But we must excuse him, for he had a grudge against her for having made a very improper remark to the reverend clergyman—"You better stop your way of doing with that girl of yours, and pay me the six hundred dollars I loaned you and my salary for eight years." Very unfortunate indeed is that church. One of the ministers once got hold of two young ladies, and tried to ruin both of them. Another one secured the confidence of a very respectable family, as well as a baby with a young yellow girl raised by them. The last but not least is still on the "tapis." Yet such scoundrels as that are at liberty, and D. M. Bennett is in prison. T.

23 WOLF ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am a member of our "Farmer Club," and in a discussion not long since one Deacon Hayden said that "so long as he lived not a pound of hops or a bushel of barley should be grown upon his farm, and any man who did grow these articles he would respect the less for it."

Not long since an old Methodist lady said I was not "fit to liv among folks" because I didn't believe in a "personal God." Of course a farmers' club is hardly the place to discuss these matters, but Deacon Hayden opened the ball, and so I prepared a paper requiring one-half an hour to present the same, and obtained consent to read it, they not knowing upon what subject I was to speak. I took the text from Shakspere, "It is too much proven that with devotion's visage and pious action we do sugar over the devil himself."

Well, sir, to tell the truth, a bombshell thrown into camp could not create greater excitement. Some thought it a disgrace; others thought I did just right. They undertook to shut me off. I had too many friends for that. I took up Mr. Bennett's case; told them of the great petition sent to Washington, etc.; held Mr. Comstock up to them in full view; related his experience with the nude girls on Greene street, with Blandin, the young lawyer, with Mrs. Dr. Chase, etc., etc. I did my duty, and nothing more. Some thought it a disgrace, others that I hurt myself very much. I hav yet to be convinced that it is a disgrace to tear the mask from a Winslow, a Chase, a Glendenning, or a Cowley. I hav yet to learn that the truth spoken wherever it may be, either in a farmers' club or on the "housetop," can injure him who proclaims it.

With best wishes for every one on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and connected with it, I am sincerely yours,

IRVING C. TERRY.

TACOMA, W. T., Feb. 9, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: George Atkinson has installed himself absolute monarch, and expects his employees to bend to his will, not only in matters appertaining to their daily work in the saw-mill, but also in religious matters. His mind, being of the expansive order, cannot occupy itself with thinking only for the body belonging to it, but must needs seek diversion in thinking for the large corps of men whom he for the present controls.

One year ago a meeting was held in honor of Thomas Paine. This was very displeasing to the lord of the sawdust, and he issued his royal proclamation that "no more Paine meetings must be held in the land." But he "reckoned without his host," and this year witnessed even a more successful meeting than before. When the first rumor of the intended celebration reached the ears of royal George his anger knew no bounds. "Clothed in a little brief authority," he raised the head from the shoulders of one whom he deemed the ringleader, a man who for five years had held one position and given entire satisfaction in the discharge of his duties. This he thought would strike terror to the hearts of the remaining doubters and cause them to "hide their diminished heads" in fear and trembling. Never was monarch more mistaken. His "boo" didn't amount to anything, and in due course of time the Paine meeting took place in spite of opposition. But he could punish, or thought he could, even if he could not prevent, so off came the head of another Freethinker, one who for three years had performed the same duties in a satisfactory manner. His threats hav extended to all in his employ who dare to differ with his high mightiness.

The spirit exhibited by Atkinson in this matter is the same as that which actuated his forefathers in the days of the Inquisition, and he, if he dared, would employ flames and the rack to induce people to accept his belief.

LEWIS E. CALDWELL.

WESTON, OREGON, Feb. 8, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: While away from home my wife sent for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is always a welcome visitor. You will see even in this remote part of the country you are not forgotten by the Freethinkers who believe in free speech and free mails.

The news of your iniquitous sentence fell upon the ears of many of this country like the clap of thunder at noonday, entirely unexpected. They had not altogether lost confidence in the honor and integrity of our much-lauded "Christian courts of justice," and confidently expected the dishonest ruling of Benedict's would be reversed. We all consider your trial a farce upon American jurisprudence and your sentence a disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century.

We hav Christian fanatics here as well as in the East, who are bitterly opposed to us and our opinions, as well as THE TRUTH SEEKER. My wife, while visiting one of our neighbors, had THE TRUTH SEEKER with her, and this Christian neighbor upon finding out it was an Infidel paper, said she would not hav it in her house. The lady forgets how she accused her neighbor's girl, who had attended her in sickness, of a theft, and then afterwards found out the girl was innocent of the charge. She wished the matter to be kept quiet, and appears as sanctimonious as ever, still encouraging others to read the Bible.

C. Chamberlain, an expounder of the gospel, had an altercation in the post-office the other day with a Freethinker whom he owed a debt. They differed in opinion in regard to it, whereupon this man of God called the other a liar. After reading of this affair in the Weston Leader, he became very hostile, as well as his lambs in wolf's clothing, so much so as to say, "There is a certain class of people here that retard the progress of Christianity."

Another divine, by the name of J. K. Morrison, preacher of the Presbyterian church, refused to grant the dying request of a little girl. She wanted him to pray for her and read a selected chapter of the Bible. The reason this impostor denied the request of the little girl was because he was afraid of catching the diphtheria. The afflicted father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner, lost three little girls from the above disease, and their Christian friends failed to help them in their sore distress; but Freethinkers responded to the call, and remained with them through all of the sickness. Christians called upon us to go to the sick, as they were afraid to do so.

The North Methodists are holding a spasmodic revival here. Last evening their preacher, Mr. Pruit, said, "All those that are convinced without a doubt that Jesus Christ has pardoned their sins will stand up," at which a few responded. But they were a fine display of ignorance!

Mr. Bennett, you hav warm friends here, who, if they could, would help you financially, but cannot at present. As for myself, as long as THE TRUTH SEEKER is conducted as it has been I will be a subscriber. Yours truly,

J. M. TIMMINS.

HARVARD, ILL., Feb. 19, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Mr. Eli C. Ohmart, a young man of considerable scientific ability, has been delivering Freethought lectures in northern Illinois and southern Wisconsin during the past few weeks. He has had good success and is going to be the coming young orator. His lectures are based on the scientific demonstrations of the age, such as evolution and its correlative doctrines, and he succeeds in giving religion many rude shocks. His exposition of the natural origin and duties of man are unusually forcible and convincing. He is eloquent in the highest degree, very earnest and entertaining, and cannot fail to become a popular speaker. Possessing a good command of language, thoroughly acquainted with his subjects, warm and broad in his sympathies, poetical in his nature, a master of the situation when before an audience, and very pleasing in his manner, he must sooner or later become one of the champions of Liberalism, natural morality, and modern reforms. As a philosopher he is of the Huxley, Darwin, Haeckel, and Spencer type. His style of oratory is argumentative, and in the lofty and beautiful poetry of his eloquence we find a rival if not an equal of the great Ingersoll. He is a young man of unexceptionable character, has a wife and child, and presents a pleasing appearance on the stage.

CORNING, IA., Feb. 19, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Feeling it a duty to all lovers of Freethought to write up the crimes committed by the orthodox Christians, I take the liberty to speak through the medium of your paper of a black deed perpetrated in Creston, Iowa, on the 2d inst., by one Mrs. Chase, who is now under arrest charged with maltreating an adopted girl nine years of age. In her leisure moments she was in the habit of beating the child with iron pokers, potato-mashers, and sausage-cutters, occasionally varying the entertainment by burning her on a hot stove. The child is covered with "sacred" scars, has one ear torn off, and a broken pelvic bone. She is one of the scholars of the "blessed" Sabbath-school, under the jurisdiction of Mrs. Chase's husband, who is superintendent of the Sabbath-school at that place. Mr. Chase has since been arrested as being implicated in the crime. Mrs. Chase is now playing the insanity dodge. "The Sabbath-school; that blessed place!"

Very truly, A. M. COPP.

KEOTA, IA., Feb. 22, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed order for $3. I hav been sick nearly all winter with disease of the lungs, and I will hardly liv to hear of Mr. Bennett's resurrection from his tomb. I am living on a lonesome farm, but keep very good company; that is, papers and books—the spirits of the living and the dead. I am not so well at home in the English language as in the German. Yet Spiritualists allow us to get more perfect when swinging through the air—allow us even to learn a new language. "With the Lord nothing is impossible," says the priest; and "with the spirit nothing is impossible," says the medium. I was born a Materialist, because my parents were Freethinkers. I could never believe in the appearance of spirits, because there are none. We inherit from our parents the live warmth, and, with tender care, the little flame is kept growing, the electro-magnetic combination, with the phosphoretic substance of the brain, enlarging, till we see the spark. Notice the first idea in the young eyes; closely united, they grow up together, body and mind, or muscle and nerve, now and then disturbed by disease or weakness of old age; but when the body lays cold, and the movements of the brain cease, we will wait for new thoughts in vain. We may as well wait for the spirit of our old broken reaper to do our harvesting as to wait for a new thought in a dead body. Great deeds will liv in history, and great spirits liv in their books and writings; that is all the Spiritualism that I allow to exist.

Swinging round the globe? Now we all agree that this little earth has been able to produce mankind for one hundred million years. Will any one count the amount of human spirits now swinging, not to count the animal spirit at all, though it has the same right to swing as we hav? The air is thick with them, and we can't help inhaling, in every breath, grandmothers and grandfathers of all the nations. Now, my Spiritual friends, what do you think about the appearance of the holy Virgin? No spirit has so great a right or cause as she, called on by hundreds of millions every hour, and her son worshiped by the same number of voices. Should not her mother-heart add to the glory of her son? The only mistake is, she never shows herself to Infidels, and keeps out of the way of the police, and she is stamped humbug. Will not every true and thoughtful man pass the same verdict?

But what about your mediums with the dollar entree? They are certainly well-educated antrophognosts; they read by lineaments of the face the furrows that fate harrowed through our mind; read by our dim eyes the march of destiny that rolled over us; they hav interviewers at every hotel, street-car, and corner; they giv answers in general, and "one cap fits a thousand heads." With all this help, they can produce now and then an answer astonishing, oracular, that will make scores of believers. You hav all seen performers of jugglery. Their acts sometimes seem really wonderful, impossible, until you see how they do it and what help they hav. It is nothing then. Allow me one sample. The operator stepped forth from behind his counter, came before his audience with a big jug under his arm, and offered drinks to every one who choose; and so he did, every man proclaiming that he received what he required. Scores of drinks floated through the same hole. Only when one asked for buttermilk did the juggler hesitate. Seemingly there was no buttermilk spirit in that jar; but the man stood on his request and received his drink, but said he was not sure whether it was buttermilk or not. How easy is the producing of a phantom! You do the preparing yourself, and the spirit you want to see and hear stands home-made in your brain. Before a phantom appears on the stage, recollection of the days of childhood will dreamily overcome you, and you imagine you hear the voices of your dear ones, when it is your own or some one else's whisper.

This oriental idea of a dream-like existence in eternity, this longing for something mysterious and unnatural; this clinging to the hope to liv forever, is it egoism? Why, oh why, won't you giv us rest after this life of sorrow and pain? Why disturb the peace of the tomb for the purpose of endless swinging in the universe? But why do I write about rest? Does not the substance of our body change all the time? Atoms of our former body are, maybe, growing in yon tree or in the rose-bush over the way. And it seems to be our duty to hav this body dissolved after death in the quickest way possible—by cremation, for instance—to enable our atoms to join new life in nature's household.

A few weeks ago I read Mr. Bruce's letter about that skilful spirit so handy in opening locks. This brought me to write about Spiritualism. How easy Mr. Bruce was captured! Yet such a lock-opening spirit could be made very useful. The equalization of property, that is strongly advocated in some corners, can go on noiselessly by the help of some rascal spirit in opening the safes; no drilling and thundering blasting any more; and the police will only call it theft, not robbery, and comfort the equalizer accordingly. I hav taken too much of your time already.

Very respectfully, CHAS. NAUMANN.

HASTINGS, MINN, Feb. 18, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Your paper is the brightest star in our firmament for the diffusion of light over all errors, and for the advancement of our interest it has no equal. Although your enemies are legion and powerful in their evil designs to annihilate your business and freedom's cause, yet they are frail in their efforts, being like the devil, divided against himself, that is, through the ignorance of the church militant.

There is a Rev. H. T. Miller in Chicago who wants to grind Mr. Ingersoll and the rest of the Infidels because they would not join his flock and get shorn for the benefit of the saints and his brain made god. It would be much better for him to investigate the origin of what he preaches, and the nature of his vile nonsense, than to vilify his benefactors. It would relieve the preachers of their venom if they would go to Australia and see their brother natives not able to count their fingers, living on snails and grubs, and swallowing the vermin of their own bodies. They could also see their brother natives similarly situated on the northwest coast of this country. What a godlike image they represent! The more they could see of their animal habits the more they would seek after their origin, which would not be a very difficult task to perform, provided they were versed in geology. In the tropical islands, they could see them almost amphibious. In the South Pacific islands, I hav seen the natives one third of their time in the water, showing clearly how man originated in the early hot seas, in a reptilian form. Those hot seas and lands were then the polar regions of our planet, which first cooled off, and gave birth to the early forms of life, while the torrid and temperate zones were then a volcanic boiling commotion, and for ages after were not fit for any form of life. The cooling process, together with geologic changes and outgrowing conditions, has driven man from his ancestral home to the different islands of the world.

The color of the different races was caused by the color of the land shore, where the parent stock dwelt in their amphibious state. In an old ocean deposit of gravel and marine shells in British Columbia, at the base of the Rocky Mountains, close by Alaska, I dug up a well finished grain-crushing stone implement from the depth of fifteen feet, and also petrified portions of cocoanut, showing that the place was tropical in the past, and also proving that the far North was populated before America existed. In Ireland I helped dig up a stone hand-mill from an old ocean deposit of cemented tropical shell and gravel, twelve feet deep proving that that part of the planet was peopled before Ireland existed. I hav a piece of petrified cocoanut-tree taken from a quarry here in Dakota county, clearly showing that there were groves of that timber growing in this latitude before the present country existed. As the water-worn surface of this land is a vast graveyard of old ocean inhabitants, the bowlder-stone on those prairies are nearly all foreign, being transported by icebergs from the shores of the far North in the last geologic change. In one conglomerate pebble I counted four smooth spherical surfaces, one within the other, the inner pebble being green sand-stone, proving all changes correct through each transition in ages' ancient day. The nearer we approach the poles the more indications of past life the rocks exhibit. In the sea-worn stone of Geelong plains, Australia, and Canterbury, New Zealand, I saw more remains of early life than I could on the shores of Central America. The Panama rock, and that of the Sandwich Islands, contain little or no marks of early life, through their volcanic and primitive condition.

If the preachers would study the nature and causes of the planet's crust they would hav less to relate concerning the barbarous Bible and the ancient cannibal gods of Asia.

Occasionally I will giv the friends something new.

Yours, THOS. KINGSTON.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 22, 1880

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav just been reading Bro. Bennett's "Good Bye," and am not ashamed to acknowledge that tears are blinding me while writing this:

"He turned and left the spot;
Oh, do not deem him weak,
For dauntless was the soldier's heart,
Though tears were on his cheek.

'Go watch the foremost ranks,' he cried,
'In danger's dark career,
And know the hand most valiant there
Has wiped away a tear.'"

Dear Macdonald, I was first introduced to you and Bro. Bennett's faithful corps of assistants in your issue of August 2, 1879, when the persecuted one was so rudely torn from you and taken to Albany. That was indeed a sad parting scene, never to be forgotten. I cannot express my admiration for the confidence he reposed in you, and the faithful and masterly manner in which you hav conducted the paper since our noble hero's incarceration. All true Liberals owe you a debt of sincere gratitude, which they will be sure to pay to all who hav so faithfully performed their several parts. May your usefulness, prosperity, and happiness always increase; and may you, each and all, liv and die in the triumph of truth, good and worthy truth seekers.

Books came duly to hand. I hav read them carefully through, and find no historical or philosophical errors in either Ingersoll or Graves. It is very clear that Christians never can truthfully and successfully answer and confound Graves' historical quotations. If not, then Christianity is positively and absolutely a plagiarism from paganism. This, in my mind, is a well sustained fact. Nor can Ingersoll's philosophical arguments on the mistakes of Moses ever be refuted. Liberals are not apt to speak or write what cannot be sufficiently proved.

"Cook and Comstock Cancer-Planters" was written in defense of him who is now most unjustly confined in prison and therefore cannot defend himself. How shockingly infamous and unjust to strike and trample on a fallen foe! No gentleman could stoop to such base degradation. None but a Christian or a hypocritical Liberal could possibly be guilty of such cruel acts. How infinitely contemptible must that man be who, under the cloak of religion or spurious Liberalism, falsely calls his fellow-man a "cancer-planter" or a libertine, simply because his humane brother cannot possibly believe all the myths, superstitions, and inconsistencies which he, without sufficient proof and reason, ignorantly subscribes to! He is guilty of three great crimes—slander, falsehood, and persecution. This is the true spirit and essence of Christianity and Liberal hypocrisy, the cause of all the dreadful persecutions of all ages, and these will continue as long as Christianity exists.

My profound regards to the faithful corps of assistants, who hav so nobly performed their several parts. Keep on. Please remember me to Bro. Bennett and wife.

Most respectfully yours, E. N. K.

COOK AND COMSTOCK CANCER-PLANTERS.

Cook and Comstock hav got cancer
On the brain and on the lungs—
Got it bad, and cannot answer,
Only with deceitful tongues.
Holy pair of new-born twins,
Jesus pardoned all their sins.

Cancer-planters, Cook and Comstock,
Both distinguished Christian names;
Both are holy Christian pure stock;
Both do play the Christian games;
Both hav elongated face;
Both to any cause disgrace.

Their profession of religion
Is a cloak to hide their sins;
And their God a "dove" or pigeon—
Holy Ghost—here Christ begins.
Both are pagan Christian tools;
Both brought up in heathen schools.

Though their God did die to keep them
From decoying and from lies,
God will let the devil sweep them
In the flames, like swarms of flies.
Men of God, of cancer fame;
Holy Christians, without shame.

Cancer-planters, dupes, deceivers;
Full of holiness and spite;
Pious frauds, but good believers;
Nude young harlots their delight.
Holy hypocrites and frauds,
Worshipers of pagan gods.

Protestant reformers, duly
Authorized to persecute;
Infidels despise them, truly,
And their cruel creeds refute.
"Cancer-planters!" they may shout,
But their sins will find them out.

Go ahead, dear cancer-planters,
But giv Infidels fair play;
We will giv you truthful answers
For the spite which you display.
We do never persecute;
'Tis the Christians' grand pursuit.

God forgive those cancer-planters,
Who their heathen creeds believe;
Cook and Comstock, great descanters,
'Tis their business to deceive.
Get their living preaching lies,
Cancer-planters we despise.

War in heaven. God, how frightful!
Trillions holy angels slain;
All the combatants were spiteful,
And determined they would reign.
God himself at last did win,
And sent Satan here to sin.

Satan when he came succeeded;
He has had the most to say.
Cook and Comstock both were needed
To help Satan hav his way.
Satan sees they both are right,
Making laws to make men fight.

Fighting once was God's amusement,
Both in heaven above and here;
'Twas the ancient Jews' amusement,
We in our time think it queer
That Jehovah used to fight,
And in murder took delight.

God and man are moral agents,
And can any course pursue,
And will always be free agents
If that war in heaven is true,
Angels, devils, men, and all;
Free to stand and free to fall.

If Cook's creed is true, 'tis certain
Other worlds like this are lost,
Let us lift the dreadful curtain,
And attempt to count the cost.
People in all worlds are free,
Eating apples, fell—you see,

Fallen worlds must all hav saviors
To redeem them from their fall,
That, by holy, good behavior,
Faith and works may save them all;
But the murderer and knave,
Faith alone in Christ can save.

All good Infidels are going
Into everlasting bliss;
But ungodly Christians flowing
Through a bottomless abyss—
Much against Jehovah's will—
Hell with Christians soon must fill.

Cancer-planters, do, for God's sake,
Now adopt a perfect plan.
Cancer-planters, for your own sake,
Hav some mercy if you can;
And if God his works disown,
Cook and Comstock mount his throne.

E. N. K.

BEMIS HIGHTS, March 13, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It would be exceedingly difficult to confine language to myself in rendering a thank-offering to you for your eighth letter from "behind the bars," as there are in this rural and thinly populated place other hearts and tongues than mine that express sympathy for you with increasing interest in your paper. I am much pleased with the clear, logical, and comprehensive manner of dealing with the creature gods of this earth. Still we continue to admire the propaganda and evolution of Jesus as in keeping with the genius of truth. In the language of Shakers, to whom I am indebted for a short and pleasing acquaintance with you, "I thank you kindly."

Yours CHARLES PARRY.

Comstock Condemned.

A Baptist minister writes the following sensible lettter to the Tribune concerning Comstock and his ways:

SIR: As a citizen, a taxpayer, and a clergyman, having a numerous parish, I wish to protest against the work of Anthony Comstock and his associates. I protest against his lottery raids because they are heartless and persecuting. Clerks and buyers are locked up under oppressive laws, enacted because of a popular prejudice. I hold that the best cure for lottery gambling is to let buyers sicken of the business just as outsiders do of stock buying, by reaping a crop of disappointment. At any rate do not tell us that the United States mails are to be invaded by spies. There is neither morality nor honesty in seizing money in lottery offices. To giv it to the poor, savors of the method of old-time English footpads who robbed from the rich and gained safety by subsidizing the poor.

I protest against the whole system of spies and the lying thereby enacted. It is a disgrace to try to commit the church to these methods. If it be a crime to appeal to the cupidity of the wicked, and cheat them under promise of gain in investing in lotteries, etc., is it not equally a crime to appeal to the cupidity of the wicked by pretending to be a bona fide buyer of a ticket only to lead the seller to ruin?

I protest against the pretentious and futile raids on disreputable houses which only disturb public morality by lifting the curtain and dropping it after the innocent hav seen. Well might a fallen woman say, "They raid us or they tell us to leave our business. If we promise to reform Christians pray over us, sing to us; out of meetings, shun us. We get only hymns, slights, and hunger. Our associates in sin and death are our only true friends. To leave our present life is only drudgery or hunger. There is no way for a fallen woman to get up and back."

Why is not some method devised to stop the fall beforehand, and to recover the weak girl by offering her a home and work such as she could do, such as she did before the fall? She tries to reform, and nine cases out of ten she is asked go to heavy domestic service to compete with the brawny Irish emigrant.

I protest against the law and the proceedings under them of Anthony Comstock, wherein he attempts to regulate and prohibit the sale of certain things hitherto commended by prudent physicians as harmless and yet invaluable to sickly and overburdened mothers. I am aware of the fact that some of those who hav favored these prohibitions buy and use what they denounce. Common sense is a jewel, and there ought to be laws, if we are going to invade the privacy of homes, to discourage the bringing into existence of weaklings; also to guard the mothers from burdens that prevent them for caring for the children they hav.

Finally, I protest against the obscene so-called "exhibitions" given by the said Comstock. Hundreds of clergymen, deacons, and other men hav been invited to see the tools, pictures, and such things that this man has forcibly taken from the owners. Not only hav these degrading things been frequently shown to large gatherings of men, but scores hav been invited to private views. These shows hav been given frequently for years. "The elect" behold them! The pretense is that this will awaken public opinion against them. Very well. Let us hold to the line. If gathering men to look at them will make them hate them let us hav them on sale for men everywhere. I deem the whole thing impertinent folly; as a remedy, shabby; in the light of justice, dishonesty and fraud; in the line of government, the setting up of a dangerous precedent, and the establishing of principles that undermine our liberty and put us back toward despotism.

Go West, Young Man; Go West!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a few weeks I am to make a practical application of Horace Greeley's advice, and go West. I shall make a trip through New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. Those who desire lectures by me will do well to put themselves in communication with me soon, as I wish to employ all my time while away until my return. It not unfrequently happens that parties desire lectures of me when I am not far away from their localities, but having my time engaged ahead I am not able to comply with their wishes. It is a great deal better for both lecturer and people to make arrangements for lectures some weeks ahead. For terms address W. S. BELL.

OUR own opinion is never wrong.

Toleration.

BY ANNIE E. DE FRIESE.

Though we cannot agree in opinion,
Without hate, for the right let's be strong,
For hate is too often the minion
Or the powerful ally of wrong.

While the truth we never should smother,
To this we should all be agreed:
He who sees no good in another
Is a self-righteous bigot indeed.

While with error we make fierce contention,
How much better the world would become
If discussion would pause at dissension
And partisan malice be dumb!

The Doctrine of Total Depravity.

A PREACHMENT.

"The church bell, which elsewhere calls people to worship God, calls them together in Scotland to listen to a preachment.—Isaac Taylor.

His text was one that gave him room
To fume, and fulminate, and make
The house of God a house of gloom,
In which to make the sinner quake.
Corruption was the theme of it,
And hell the lurid gleam of it.

Mankind, he preached, were poisoned through,
Corrupt without, corrupt within,
Black was the universal hue.
"In short," said he, "the rock of sin
On every side has wrecked you all,
Moral and intellectual."

He proved each man from head to foot
A mass of putrefying sore.
Thoughts festering in a heart of soot,
Sin oozing out at every pore;
The body and the soul of us,
The devil had the whole of us.

He loved his theme, 'twas clear enough,
For all the rottenness and dirt
And rank defilement of the stuff.
One felt he had the thing at heart.
He hugged it so and handled it,
And dressed it up and dandled it.

Then plunging past the gates of death
He mixed the sinner's awful cup,
Till hot and red he stopped for breath,
And mopped the perspiration up.
If terror could refashon us,
He did not spare the lash on us.

I saw him when his task was done,
His gown and morals packed away;
His deep self-satisfaction won;
His reeking supper on the tray;
And looking through the smoke of it,
'Twas then I saw the joke of it.

The pious wrath, the wordy run,
From practiced mouth too glibly poured,
Which makes us feel that we hav done
Some special service for the Lord,
Oh, the deceiving seed of it!
The tongue without the deed of it.

There is no warmer friend to progress and mental freedom among all the readers of our beloved TRUTH SEEKER than good Dr. Fellows, and if you are afflicted with any of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to, I hope you will one and all giv our Liberal friend an opportunity to make you well again—to render the physical casket a fit receptacle for the jewel of the mind, which is THE ALL that makes us what we are and renders us worthy of the love, admiration, and respect of our kind."

Revelations of Antichrist
Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser, What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treament, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

It is well known that he seldom livs frugally who livs by chance. Hope is always liberal, and they that trust her promises make little scruple of reveling to-day on the profits of to-morrow.—Dr. Johnson.

You Christians tell us of "glad tidings of eternal life," but we know nothing of such incomprehensibles as "eternal lives." Every life we hav any knowledge of has had a beginning, and has either already ended or is approaching a visible end. All the gods, even, die and are no more. Yours is in his death agonies, and vain is all the skill of the D.D.'s in his behalf. His fate is sealed. No power in all the universe can save him. The past to us is only the primer of our childhood. We hav learned its lessons, profited by its teachings; but we must go on beyond it. We must stand upon its shoulders and look over newer and brighter landscapes. We must keep on climbing up, and not let a book tie us down and be a clog to our progress. Every age makes its pretenses and promises but each succeeding age sees brighter and better ones ahead.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

How easily an end could be put to religious dissensions that divide the world, to sectarian disputes, to the bitter quarrels that provoke lying and slander, and justify, or seem to warrant, meanness unspeakable! In Turkey the Mohammedan oppresses the Christian; in England the Christian ostracizes the Jew; in America the Christian will hav nothing to do with the Buddhist or Chinese. Turn the tables. How would the Christian like to be persecuted as he persecutes? How would the Turk like being oppressed as he oppresses? . . . . Suppose the Atheists were in power. Would not Theists feel that they hav a right to be represented as human beings? Fair play on all sides would instantly change the tone of the religious press, which is a disgrace to Christendom today, . . . Each religion would simply hav to remember that it is but one; that other faiths hav an equal right; that we are all under equal laws; that we all hav a claim to equal privileges.—O. B. Frothingham.

Never be angry with any person merely because his opinion is not your opinion; never be angry because you cannot persuade him to change his opinion; and, above all, never do him any injury or hesitate about doing him any good because his opinion and yours are different. Nobody can believe what he likes, however he may try to do so; at all events, if he hears all that is to be said on all sides of a question. Still less can anybody believe according to the likings of others. When you doubt, inquire. In your own opinion, seek nothing but truth, because truth, after all, is the great thing. In your conduct to others, be guided by the rule that you should never cause useless pain. In the minds of the best men there is, always has been, and always, perhaps, will be, much difference of opinion as to what is true, but everybody knows and feels what is kind; and truth itself is most likely to be found when it is sought for by tolerance and benevolence.—Bowring.

Some persons pray for their daily bread, it is true, and some do not; but every one, without exception, either works for it himself, or secures the services of some of his fellow-men. He who would wish to secure a fortune or to learn a language, and content himself with praying that God would transfer stock to him, or pour down the gift of tongues, would be decided as insane. If you ask a man whether he would rely upon petitions to heaven for the accomplishment of any definite earthly wish the incongruity of the means to the end appears then so glaring that he thinks you are ridiculing him, although the language employed may be the gravest and most decorous. He will pray either for objects which he is sure to obtain with or without prayer, such as his daily bread, or for objects which he cannot tell whether he obtains or not, such as that the kingdom of God may come, that his will may be done on earth as it is in heaven, etc., or for vague and indiscriminate gifts, the fulfilment of which is not to be referred to any distinct time, such as health, longevity, good desires, etc. It is only by its results being thus kept in the dark that the inefficiency of prayer is protected from exposure.—Beauchamp.

GENESIS I.: II.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by

A Few Words About the Devil

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1.25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

Notes and Clippings.

ARE clergymen to hav no kissing privileges? Here is a Boston bridegroom who berated the minister for kissing the bride.

ROMULUS was brought up by a wolf, in a much more tender and humane manner than if he had been brought up in the "Shepherd's Fold," New York.

IT has transpired that the expense of bringing the Egyptian obelisk known as Cleopatra's Needle to this country is being borne by W. H. Vanderhilt.

A COLORED Methodist pastor of St. Helena, La., was accused of stealing bacon, and his presiding elder deposed him; but the congregation stuck to him loyally, drove his successor out of the pulpit with knives, clubs, and pistols, and finally burnt the church.

AT a school exhibition in Lincoln, Pa., the floor gave way, precipitating two hundred people to the story below. Though many were seriously injured, none were killed. The building took fire, but the flames were extinguished before they had gained much headway.

TWO BOSTON women of "culture" came across an old-fashioned milestone in the suburbs. One read the inscription, "1 m. from Boston," and the other said, "Here is a grave, perhaps of some young girl, who wished it written on her tombstone, 'I'm from Boston.' How simple and sufficient!"

MRS. SWANSON heard a sermon on hell, in Chicago, and the preacher's vivid description of eternal torment greatly frightened her. She brooded over the subject several days, then became possessed of the idea that she had committed the unpardonable sin, and finally sank into incurable lunacy.

ANOTHER good man gone to the dogs. As usual, in all such cases, he was a good church-member and Sunday-school teacher. He would not allow the name of Bob Ingersoll to be mentioned in his family, but he forged papers to the amount of $80,000. The church should get him up a subscription, for if this thing goes on there will be no church-members left.

THEY are having a warm time just now in Kansas Sunday-schools, and the question under discussion is, Whether the boy who has fairly won the prize Bible, by learning three thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven verses in three months, can be ruled off the track for putting furniture tacks and a wad of shoemaker's wax in the superintendent's chair.

"ONE war at a time" was a wise saying of Abraham Lincoln, and should be heeded by Mr. Anthony Comstock, who is not the man to levy undiscriminating hostilities against the newspaper reporters of this city. Aye, there are black sheep among them, but, striking a fair average, they hav nothing to dread from a comparison, moral or intellectual, with Mr. Comstock. He rose for prayers, so to speak, in the Baptist preachers' meeting yesterday. The brethren should hav begged for him the gift of a well-bridled tongue.—Sun.

"WHAT do you think of Tom Paine?" asks Rev. G. W. Candice, of Utica, N. Y. From what we know of the man, and the great work he did for American independence when many were too cowardly to speak their minds, we believe that God did better for him in the matter of brain, common sense, disposition to humanity, and all that makes man loved of God, than he did by all of those who assail his memory. In other words, that he was a great, a noble, a patriotic, a good and very useful citizen. Would to heaven there were 10,000 like him in America to-day.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Investigator will be appropriately celebrated by a public meeting in the Paine Memorial, on Wednesday, April 21st. All subscribers and friends of the paper in the city and vicinity (and especially those who are not too aged or infirm to attend), are kindly invited to be present at this reunion. Also, all the employes (compositors, pressmen, and boys) who are yet alive and may see or hear of this notice, are urgently requested to favor us with their company. The celebration will be made interesting and pleasant.—Investigator.

THE New Jersey Sabbath Union has had the Sunday laws of the state printed for general circulation. The laws impose a fine of one dollar for traveling, worldly employment, ordinary or servile work (works of necessity and charity excepted), for shooting, fishing, frequenting tippling houses, or playing games on the Christian Sabbath; also, a penalty of two dollars for exposing goods for sale and for driving cattle, sheep, or swine on Sunday. Those observing Saturday as the Sabbath are excepted. How this is enforced any one can see that visits Atlantic City or Cape May on a Sunday in summer.

DEPUTY-COLLECTOR ROBINSON, of Westfield, Mass., has obliged the Rev. A. B. Dufresne, a French Catholic priest of Holyoke, to settle for selling liquor without a United States license, and Dufresne has left for Canada. He had four casks of liquor in the basement of the church, in the same room where a juvenile school was held, and several persons are ready to testify they hav bought liquor from him. Dufresne is the priest who told his people not to patronize Joseph Parker, a hackman who had displeased him, and so destroyed his business, for which Parker recovered $3,400 damages in the Superior Court last fall.

MR. MINOT JUDSON SAVAGE, a Boston Unitarian minister, had instructed his little girl with the idea that a portion of God was perceptible in everything that was noble and beautiful. The child, as children do, had got this idea very ingeniously fitted into her own mind ready for application at a moment's warning. One day, as the door-bell rang, she presented herself in the hall just in season to receive one of Dr. Bartol's benignant smiles, and to fully observe that gracious, benignant figure. Immediately she sped to her father with this exclamation, "Oh, papa! papa! the whole of God has come now!" Dr. Bartol declared that he had never been so flattered in his life.

MRS. ANNIE BALLARD, of 125 Germantown avenue, Philadelphia, was before Magistrate Krickbaum the other day charged with cruelly treating Cora Dorsey, a child which she had adopted about one year ago. It was in evidence that the girl had been frequently locked up in a small closet by her foster mother as a punishment for trifling offenses. Recently Mrs. Ballard confined the child in the closet for over forty-eight hours without food. During this long period the little one was made to repeat prayers for hours in succession, and for refusing was flogged and otherwise abused. The Magistrate fined the woman $10, and ordered the child to be returned to its mother.

THREE of the converts of the Salvation Army hav had a relapse. John Richards, who professed on Tuesday evening to hav been blessed by the Holy Spirit, got drunk yesterday, and went down to the Pickwick House, where the army has had headquarters, and wanted to fight. He did not want to fight the devil, he said, "I'm a man and men are good enough for me to fight with. Oh! I'm a hitter, and I want Railton to come out here till I club him. I've had 'ligion—lots of it. I git drunk just as I git 'ligion—I git full of it. I'm a backslider from Kalamazoo, whoop!" The counsels of a policeman calmed the vivacious intrepidity of Mr. Richards, and he said he would watch and pray silently until Mr. Railton came, and then he would "fix him." Pretty soon he broke out again: "As for them dough-faced gals, why they can tarry at Jericho until their beards grow—that's from Samuel. Oh, I'm a Scripture sharp, and don't you forget it! Them girls ain't doing nothing good; they're unctious and greasy enough to be good preachers, but they ain't winning. 'Tisn't the beauty, it's the winning ways that fetches the sin sick sheep that's astray from the fold. Yes, I did say I had 'ligion. I've had it as many times as I've been drunk, and that's a useless number, and I'm giving it to you straight. What givs it to me? Religion? Dogonmyskin 'fi know."

"Mr. Richards, you didn't use such language as that when you were relating your experience the other night at Hudson River Hall."

"Course I didn't. W'as-z-use? Got two vernaculars for two purposes. When I'm drunk I'm drunker'n anybody. When I'm converted I'm more converteder 'n anybody."

Mr. Richards was evidently in the superlative degree of his boasted inebriety, and his utterance became clogged with the effort of speech, so that, important as it was for him to remonstrate with the policeman who took him firmly by the collar, he was only able to smile in maudlin confidence and indorse the situation by an indistinct and oft repeated "'s all ri'."—N. Y. Herald.

SOME of the citizens of New York were treated to an exhibition of Sabbatarian bigotry Sunday night, so perfectly ridiculous that it may not, unlikely, hurry the growth of a public sentiment already spreading, against the laws that prevent some people from enjoyments that do not interfere with the rights of others. Here was a large theater filled with people attracted to witness an alleged exposure of the mysteries of Spiritualism. Nothing that the performer intended to do could possibly hav interfered with the comfort or prejudice of any one in the building or they would not hav been there; and if any one present was so tender of conscience that the proposed performance would hav marred his pious reflections or turned his thoughts away from a contemplation of the goodness of his Creator, he had no business there. In short, there was nothing in the intended performance to interfere with the strictest observance by the bluest Sabbatarian in the city of New York of his chosen day of worship. No noise or tumult, no disturbance of the peace, no invasion of the religious family circle, or any house of worship, and no distraction of Sunday worshipers in any way was contemplated or probable. And yet an inspector of police found upon the statute books of this state a law under which he commanded a stop to the performance. On that very night, and at that very hour, a hundred preachers were posing before as many congregations, which a hundred choirs were amusing. Church bells rang to the annoyance of numerous neighborhoods, that were not a little less bored and worried by the shouts of ranting ministers and the nasal music of their various congregations. These were nuisances because they affected people who did not voluntarily seek them, and upon whom they were forced; and police interference here would hav been rational. Not so with the performance at the Grand Opera House. No ear-splitting bell clanged before the performance; no shout or screech of performer or audience could hav annoyed any one without the theater, and within, even, all was quiet and orderly. But this performer having chosen to enlighten or amuse on Sunday night, in a private building, an audience which had wilfully sought to be thus instructed or amused at that time and in that place, and had voluntarily paid for the privilege, a law was interposed to stop him and interfere with the rational enjoyment of the people before him. The enactment of this law was procured by selfish religionists through the indifference or fear of political time-servers, its object being to turn Sunday into a Jewish Sabbath, and make it a national day of worship in accordance with the prejudice of a minority of the people who are imbued with that Puritan spirit which defines religious liberty to be the inherent right of Puritans to compel all men to do and think as Puritans do and think. The law is a remnant of the old Blue laws which, though they applied to a different day, were modeled upon the Sabbath laws of the ancient Jews. This statute should be repealed without unnecessary delay. Whatever it prohibits that is wrong if done on Sunday is equally wrong if done at any other time, and should be prohibited without limitation as to the day. The merit of an act is in the act itself, and the day on which it is committed is not an element than can make the good bad or the bad good. At least, that is the earnest conviction of a mass of people whose views, comforts, and pleasures are entitled to consideration. If church-goers think they find favor in the eyes of God by frequenting houses of worship, withdrawing from the world, and saying prayers on Sunday, let them worship, and pray, and seclude themselves in peace. They than interfere with no one, and enjoy perfect liberty themselves. But the same liberty they enjoy others are entitled to, and if others prefer to mix with the world, seek pleasure, and be comfortable, after their own fashion, on Sunday, church-goers hav no right to demand more than this preference shall be exercised in a manner not disturbing to the peaceful exercise of their own choice. Sabbatarian laws are narrow and unjust, and it is to be hoped that the stupidity of this one was made sufficiently clear by its ludicrous enforcement on a recent Sunday night to induce some legislator to see the propriety of moving its repeal.—Truth.

Does Death End All?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I believe in a future state of existence. I am certain that "death does not end all," that beyond the grave I shall liv, move, and hav an existence as real as that I now experience in this physical organism. Superstition has ever involved this question in inscrutable mystery. The church has spent untold millions in erecting costly temples, has kept the nations warring upon each other, has shed oceans of blood; persecuted, imprisoned, and murdered millions of innocent men, women, and children; caused more licentiousness, hypocrisy, and crime; produced more hypocrites, tyrants, murderers, and hardened wretches, in discussing and settling this question for the world than all other causes combined.

With Christians this question was settled eighteen hundred years ago. They need no proofs. Faith is all-sufficient. They go to heaven; sinners to hell. Still it is an open question. Thousands of the ablest of the race believe that death is annihilation, or an eternal sleep. To them every noble aspiration, every grand thought, all the beauties and mysteries of the universe, must seem as mockeries. To them the heavens and the earth must appear draped in mourning, for everywhere is written that terrible sentence, "Death is annihilation."

Having cleared away the fogs of superstition, and not being protoplasmically scientific, I hav been able to find evidences which, to my mind, point unmistakably to a life beyond the grave.

All nature is divided into two great classes, viz., causes and effects. Causes are invisible; effects, visible. No mortal eye has ever seen a cause. They are the invisible principles, the vital forces, the real builders. No cause has ever been discovered that was not or is not an inherent property of matter. Infinite cause is a myth, a heritage of superstition. The visible universe is the sum total of the effects. We are compelled to reason from effects back to causes. Trees, rocks, grasses, hills, mountains, and our bodies hav been arranged in their present shape and condition by the vital forces and causes which dwell within. The soul is the cause, the body the result. The power and intelligence which hav produced this wonderful result hav been evolved from nature, and are concentrated and individualized within these organisms themselves. Nature has been millions of years evolving sufficient intelligence and power to produce this wonderful climax. At first a combination of two or more elements produced the simplest forms of life with but the faintest trace of intelligence. Then, step by step, as greater combinations of elements occurred, higher and higher forms of life appeared, and higher phases of intelligence were evolved, until a combination of the whole, or all of the elements, resulted in man, the great unit of the universe. He is the grand climax, the glorious object for which the mills of nature hav been grinding for millions of years. He is the sum total of all the intelligences below him, and we can find none above him or beyond the point to which his capacities may not take him. "Evolution knows no finality." It tells us of an endless progression. If this is true, then where beyond man is the next step? It must go on evolving higher and higher grades of intelligence and forms of life, through all the eternities of the future as it has through all the eternities of the past. Man is an individualized identity, and capable of unlimited growth. Nothing else in the universe possesses this power of unlimited growth and expansion, therefore all below him is fragmentary, while he is the unit, "created in the image of his maker," and capable of attaining to the highest pinnacle of wisdom and power. That man possesses this infinite capacity is proof that he is the climax, that no higher forms will ever be produced on this earth. Evolution has found its finality in man, and is buried with him, or it follows him onward and upward, evolving higher and higher grades of intelligence, from sphere to sphere, through all the endless ages of eternity.

If "death ends all," humanity is a bubble, progression and evolution are limited, and the universe is a gigantic failure. I am certain that nature has labored to produce something grand and glorious, "like unto the gods," and that that object, whatever it is, is permanent as eternity itself, and if man is not that glorious climax, what is?

Every human being "was with God in the beginning," just as much, and in the same sense that the Word or Christ was. Every atom of which our material bodies are composed has always existed, never had a beginning, therefore was with God in the beginning, and if matter was then "without form, and void," so also was force and intelligence, although not evolved or individualized. Vital force and intelligence cannot be created any more than matter, and if one has always existed, then the other has also. If Christ ever lived on this earth he was the son of God in the same sense that every other human being is, no more and no less. We hav always existed, because matter has always existed. Conditions are such that part becomes individualized and passes on sooner than the rest, and the time may come when all force and intelligence will hav passed up through the material out into the great realms of the beyond. If evolution is a scientific truth, then man is immortal and will liv beyond the grave.

Those who deny the existence of a soul declare that the most rigid analysis of the human organism reveals no evidence of it, and in so doing ignore the grandest truths in nature. Conscious individualized intelligence always retains its identity from the earliest moments of existence. Matter changes many times in a lifetime, while energy changes every day and hour. The soul is permanent, steadfast, and accumulative, while the body is fleeting and changeable. Take away consciousness, and matter and energy alone remain. After consciousness has departed, so-called men of science claim they ought to find it among the rubbish that is left; and no doubt would, if they dared, claim that they ought to be able to place it in their scales and weigh it like tea, coffee, or sugar.

What is really the difference between the living and the dead? The live man can evolve thoughts, is intelligent, all the fluids are circulating and active, is electrical, full of magnetism, can be mesmerized by the superior will or mind of another, can receive knowledge, reason, comprehend, labor, and grow in strength, intelligence, and magnetic power. The dead man is a motionless, lifeless, cold mass of corruption, possessing not a trace of the above attributes or qualities. So-called men of science expect to see with the naked eye the magnet forces and thought principles of the soul, and yet they know that no mortal eye has ever seen a particle of magnetism or electricity, nor can they tell what they are, whence they come, or whither they go. All this they ignore, as they dissect with owlish pomposity the bodies of the dead, those worn-out tenements which were once teeming with the living, undying principles of the soul. Why, if they think they can see and handle the soul, do they not dissect the body before it is dead, while they are yet sure it contains the soul?

It is absurd to search for the soul after it has ceased to manifest its presence. The world would sustain very little loss if these men of science would fall to and cut each other up in their wonderful search after wisdom and that which no mortal eye has ever seen or ever can see. They can supply or fill the dead body with artificial magnetism and make it perform mechanically some of the functions of the living body; but when they succeed in supplying it with a conscious intelligence, and setting in motion all the vital fluids and forces of a living organism, they will hav achieved a triumph that will indeed entitle them to the honor of being called men of science.

We are told by these Materialistic oracles that combustion creates magnetism and intelligence. How do they know? Hav they ever proved it, or is it mere assumption? If this is true, why is not a hog or a dog as intelligent as man? Combustion is even greater in a hog than in a human being; and if it creates intelligence, etc., not only the hog, but many other animals, ought to be more intelligent, magnetic, and spiritual than man. It is a well-known fact that those who eat the most know the least. Both food and exercise are essential to combustion within our bodies. The more grease in the food the more intense the action; therefore the Esquimaux, who liv on grease, ought to be the most intelligent people on earth. Some of the greatest minds the world has ever produced hav dwelt in feeble, attenuated bodies. If combustion creates magnetism and intelligence, then those who possess the largest, healthiest, and most perfect physical organisms should be the most intelligent. Physical exercise, which is a great aid and stimulant to combustion, ought then, together with food and oxygen, to be regarded as the true standards, as they would be the true generators, of thought and magnetic force. But this is not, cannot be true. No more absurd thought was ever presented to the mind of man.

Again, why do they tell us combustion creates magnetism, etc., and in the same breath declare that throughout all the ages of the past not an atom has ever been created, never will be, nor will they ever be annihilated. Conditions may be created, but elements never. Intelligence is accumulative, and when once identified or crystallized into an individualized consciousness it never is released except by death; and if nothing was ever created, then conscious intelligence can never be annihilated. It is assumption to say that "death ends all," or that the mind returns to nature from whence it came. I do not deny that the brain is intensely active while the mind is at work, nor that there is combustion and a great rush of blood through the brain, but it is altogether a different kind of combustion from that which occurs in other parts of the body. In the body it envolves heat; in the brain nerve-fluid, magnetism, and thought. Combustion alone, therefore, cannot be given as a reason for the manifestation of consciousness and intelligence. Combustion is not a creation, but simply one of the aids by which the soul, using the brain as an instrument, is able to manifest its presence and accomplish a certain result.

Materialists hav never been able to explain how the inner consciousness receives impressions through the five senses. Vision can be traced to the optic nerve, hearing to the audic nerve, etc., but no farther. Beyond that all is assumption. There is something within us which defies all analysis, and to assume that that something is nothing is most unscientific and unreasonable. This is precisely the way that superstition and bigotry hav always regarded the truth. As long as error is popular, or can be used as stock in trade by priests, just so long will ignorance, bigotry, and superstition be dominant. It is as difficult for men of science to pull up their stakes as for priests to confess themselves hypocrites. Huxley, Tyndall, Carpenter, Lankester, and all that class, will never acknowledge themselves mistaken in this matter, for they hav solemnly pronounced their great ultimatum. They hav staked their reputation as great leaders, and, like Peter, will deny the truth, even though it be crucified again and again. I do not say they are dishonest, but having the eyes of the world upon them as great scientific leaders, it would be humiliating in the extreme to confess themselves mistaken. The little sheep and lambs all follow the great "bell wethers," and until Huxley & Co. change their base it is hopeless to ask the "smaller fry" to change theirs. Everywhere in this world the "blind are found leading the blind," and science is no less an exception than religion, politics, or fashion. If combustion in the brain creates intelligence, why do we not find thought in other parts of the body? There is no part in which combustion does not occur, and there is no part, not even the brain, where the action is so intense as in the muscles; yet no thought is evolved. The brain is the headquarters of the soul, the seat of sensation, memory, consciousness, reason, the affections, and passions. From them emanates that mysterious aura of spiritual forces which place us en rapport with the spiritual forces of the universe. It is ridiculous assumption to declare that these attributes and forces are a part of brain matter—that they are impressions stamped upon the ultimate atoms of the brain, or that they are caused by a peculiar motion of those atoms. As well talk about combustion building a railroad as to claim that it creates all the phenomena and attributes of the spirit. Man's physical organism is exceedingly like a steam-engine. When the engineer is aboard, the fire burning, and steam up, it is a thing of life, a marvel of beauty and power. It dashes along like the wind, as irresistible as the avalanche. When the engineer is absent, and the fires out, it is as harmless to do good or ill as the dead body of an infant. Just so with the human organism. If the spirit still abides within, it is a thing of marvelous beauty and power; if absent, it is powerless, and soon becomes a loathsome mass of corruption. It is claimed that dogs, horses, etc., possess the same mysterious natures, that they hav a dual nature the same as man. They, in life and death, are an exact parallel. They manifest intelligence to a certain extent. Their organisms are as wonderful, and when the soul-principle abides within, they move and act even as men do, and when dead they disintegrate and return to dust the same as man. They certainly are graded lower than man, for they are lacking many things which man possesses. Their reason and intelligence can never expand beyond a certain limit. If their capacity for growth were unlimited, humanity would be superfluous, for they would in time attain to all knowledge and power the same as man. For the same reason there is no necessity for a creature higher than man. However, I do not claim that animals will not liv hereafter. I think they will, and for the following reason: Our affections will remain the same after death, and if we love pets here we shall love them hereafter; therefore, dogs, horses, birds, statuary, paintings, books, and flowers will, of necessity, be found in spirit life. Nature never develops a demand without furnishing an adequate and corresponding supply to meet that demand. If we love existence at all we shall love continued existence, and if we love continued existence we shall desire to liv hereafter. Every other love that is proper we are permitted to gratify. Why not this? It certainly is not wrong to desire existence. It came to us without the asking, and now, as soon as we hav learned to love and desire it, it is unreasonable and cruel to take it from us. I will not believe this of mother Nature. She treats us better than we treat ourselves, and if it is possible to grant this boon she will do so. Nature is not cruel or treacherous. She does not fill us with an honest aspiration, and then mock us with annihilation. Such dirty work as that is given over into the hands of the great Jehovah, the demon-god of the Bible.

Why do we not see the soul as it leaves the body? And if spirits are about us, why do we not see them? No man has ever seen a particle of air, and yet it presses on our bodies with a weight of tons. Caloric, sunlight, universal ether, magnetism, electricity, steam, the numerous gases, the vital forces—the real builders and engineers—are all invisible and defy the most searching scrutiny; and yet we know they exist. We only reason from effects back to causes; we simply infer that such things exist; we do not know it absolutely. If we are allowed to judge of causes by effects when we reason about magnetism, etc., why not in reference to other things?

Mere flesh and blood or nerves can never produce sensation, joy, grief, love, thoughts, or consciousness. We feel joy, grief, love, or hatred, and the eyes, which are the "windows of the soul," tell us of it in language not to be mistaken. We feel that the real man—not of flesh and blood—is looking through them at us; that the body is only an incasement in which dwells the invisible spirit. All human flesh and blood—other things being equal—are alike, and we know they disintegrate and return to dust.

But this is not true of the soul. There is positively no evidence that the soul ever disintegrates. The spirit of man has always existed, therefore always will; and why declare that it disintegrates when we cannot prove it and when it is contrary to all reason or desire? I say desire advisedly, for I should be ashamed to acknowledge that I do not desire to liv; I should feel that every suicide, drone, and criminal in the land were my brothers. I sometimes think nature ought to make one exception and withhold from such that life which is not desired. There is no better rule than, "What is worth having is worth asking for."

The five senses, although marvelous in their nature, and most glorious gifts to humanity, are "the windows of the soul;" yet they come far short of revealing to us or enabling us to comprehend all there is in nature. They place the spirit en rapport with matter in its grosser forms—the effects. Sometimes more is needed to place us en rapport with the spirit of matter.

This world would indeed be a barren, desolate, and soulless place without reason, memory, and spirituality. Reason, the judge and philosopher; memory, the recorder and treasurer; and spirituality, the sixth sense, the window which reveals to us the spiritual elements of the universe. Dissect the brain, and not the slightest trace of these attributes are found. How could they be? The brain matter of one man is just like that of all other men; besides, the atoms of the brain are continually carried away and replaced by new ones. Some brains are a little coarser in texture and a little different in size, but this will not account for the attributes and power of the spirit.

As the race develops, I believe spirituality will be regarded as of more importance than all the other senses combined. Biblical, or Christian, spirituality conveys not the slightest shade of the true significance of the term. It is as false as that love that would consign an innocent being to the torments of an endless hell. To-day we read each other independent of sensation and contrary to judgment deduced from data furnished by it. Spirituality places us en rapport with the spiritual elements of our fellow-beings and of the universe around and above us. We meet people and are impressed agreeably or otherwise; we like, or dislike, and cannot tell why. The aura which surrounds us, and which is a part of our spiritual selves, blends harmoniously, or otherwise is attracted to or repelled by the spiritual aura of those we meet, and then reports to our inner consciousness the absolute truth. The five senses are often in error; the spiritual sense never.

If we would heed and obey these little monitors, these spiritual "first impressions," we should be spared many bitter experiences. I believe the time is coming when, on this earth, people will read each other's thought, and enjoy intellectual converse without the aid of language. Spirits inform us that this is true in spirit life, that they not only read each other's minds perfectly, but also ours, who are yet on the material plane. When this is fully realized by us, we shall be more careful to hav pure thoughts, and less skeletons in our closets. When that time comes, when by our spiritual sense we are able to enter the inner sanctum of the soul, and read all the secret thoughts of those we meet, the hideous deformities which now waste and blacken humanity will cease to exist, and mankind be a thousandfold purer and better. Herein lies the future development of the race. Spirituality is destined to grow until it overshadows all else in humanity.

If there is any attribute which tells us unmistakably of a future life beyond the grave, it is this sixth sense, this wonderful gift of spirituality. Facts of the utmost importance to humanity are involved in this element of spirituality. When the spiritual elements of different individuals blend harmoniously, love and friendship are the results. No love or friendship can be lasting that is not based upon the harmonious blending or chemical union of the soul elements. When they do not blend harmoniously there is a natural aversion or repulsion to each other. Hatred, or a lack of confidence, is sure to follow. Through ignorance a large proportion of all marriages are contracted utterly regardless of this great law of the chemical or spiritual adaptation of the sexes to each other. Teach the young how to love. Let them understand the difference between passion and love, and then domestic happiness will be the rule, instead of the exception. Giv us a religion which involves a proper understanding of the laws of our being, and then we may hope for the salvation of the race, and not till then. Ministers and all church papers ignore this great law. Dare to speak or write about it, and at once we are branded as "Freelovers." They know no difference between love and lust. We will charitably presume that these ministerial mouthpieces of God are as ignorant as they seem, therefore will excuse their disgraceful "nest-hidings" and adulteries. Marriage is a horrible mockery unless there is a harmonious blending of the soul elements.

Marriage that is based on lust or passion is sure to result in a domestic hell; based on love, will produce noble children; on lust, children diseased both morally and physically. Am I digressing? I think not. No question so plainly proves the dual nature of man as this of love and marriage. Passion is a sensation, an element of the "earth earthy." Love is an element or attribute of the soul, and when we obey the promptings of the soul only are we sure to be safe and right. Everything which proves we are made up of body and spirit, and especially that the spirit is superior to the body, is of importance in this discussion. If we can prove that the spirit is superior to the body in its nature and attributes, we hav an argument which cannot be ignored. The body is merely an earthly tabernacle, and all its attributes, which are summed up in the one word sensation, convey knowledge to the inner-consciousness, therefore used solely for the development of the soul. The body is changeable, while the spirit or consciousness is permanent. If the body can change many times during our lives, as scientists claim, while the spirit remains the same, may it not change at death, and the spirit still remain permanent? If the soul can survive one change of the body, can it not another? Death is simply change or disintegration of the flesh, and this being true we die every day and yet the soul survives. If the soul can survive a change or partial death of the body, can it not also when the whole body dies or is changed? Every human being should liv to a ripe old age. None should die prematurely, and this would be so had nature's laws never been violated. Humanity is in need of redemption, but of the body more than the soul. The great load of disease which the race to-day is carrying is fearful to contemplate. Those diseases, both spiritual and bodily, which are the heritage of the race, through unfortunate pre-natal conditions, together with those which are the direct results of violations of nature's laws, allow very few, comparatively, to attain to a ripe old age with the fires of the soul still brightly burning. All the soul needs in order to attain to a bright and glorious manhood and womanhood is pure and healthy bodies. When all our thoughts and associations are pure, when we cease to violate the laws of nature, to eat, sleep, drink, work, act, and think in all things as we should, then will be realized all the grand possibilities which are as yet latent in the race. I love to think of what humanity will then be, of the noble men and women that will walk this earth when all disease of the mind and body, which result from violation, is uprooted and expelled from the race. Then, and not till then, will the race be redeemed, and the millennium be at hand. Herein lies the future development of the race.

The body is the soil from whence the soul draws its sustenance and by means of which it gains development; therefore we should keep the body pure, clean, and harmonious. Pre-natal conditions are either favorable or unfavorable to the soul's development. These conditions are stamped upon the soul and not upon the body. The most beautiful and promising children often become the most degraded outcasts and villains through pre-natal conditions. These impressions must be stamped upon the soul principle of the child, for the soul only is permanent through life.

Mind impresses mind. A rapturous or emotional feeling in the presence of paintings, statuary, flowers, nature, machinery, or some loathsome horror in the mind of the mother, will evolve a corresponding love or power in the mind of the offspring, which will, in future years, develop and shape to a large extent the life and character of the individual.

This again proves there is a soul in man; that it is superior to the body; that it is the controlling principle, and that it is unchangeable through all the mutations of the body.

Nature may be again divided into two great classes: the positive and negative, or the active and passive. The positive or active commands, while the negative or passive obeys. The vital principles in nature are the positive forces, while matter is the negative. The vital forces command, while matter obeys. The engineer, fire, and steam are the positive forces which move the engine. There never has been, nor ever can be, an exception to this rule; therefore man is both positive and negative in his nature. Consciousness, or the spirit, is positive, the body negative.

Temperaments differ in different individuals very materially. In some the positive predominates, in others the negative. Herein is involved a law for the adaptation of people to each other which should be most carefully studied and thoroughly understood. Cut a magnet into separate parts, and at once those parts become independent magnets, both having positive and negative poles. Man is an independent magnet. By death the internal, or spiritual, is separated from the eternal, or earthly; and by the same law the internal, or active, principle must necessarily retain its positive and negative natures. Every atom of the dead body possesses a positive and negative pole; but the combination of all those atoms is no longer a necessity; the binding principle of consciousness having moved out, the body is permitted to disintegrate and molder back to dust.

That Materialist who says, "Destroy the stomach and you destroy digestion; destroy the brain and you destroy the mind," reminds me of the Christian who, when asked to locate the heart, placed his hand upon his stomach, and said, "Here is where I feel it." The Materialist says "the mind is a function of the brain." I hav always thought, and I think science will bear me out in my opinion, that the brain is the instrument of the mind, by which the mind manifests and givs experience and knowledge. That mind is fortunate that has a good brain to work with. Just like the musician with a good piano, or the laborer with a good tool, if out of repair, the results are not satisfactory. I would as soon call the musician the function of the piano as to declare that the mind is the function of the brain. Oh, no, Materialists are not dogmatical. Their assumptions and hypotheses are always facts, and yet they tell us "force is motion;" electricity is simply motion just as mind is a function; motion, or electricity, is nothing flying through the air; and when nothing strikes a tree it sends the splinters and limbs flying in all directions and "kills the tree dead." When they tell us "mind is motion," or activity, or a function, they get "beyond my depth." I prefer to stay on solid ground and prove all things as I go. Numerous well-authenticated instances hav occurred where the spirit has left the body and gone long distances, made examinations, and returned with a report absolutely correct, as proved subsequently. Many times objects which all parties concerned hav never heard of are correctly described. During this experience the body is always in a mesmerized or cataleptic condition. If the spirit can leave the body temporarily during life, it certainly can do so permanently at death.

No hypothesis has ever been presented by Materialists to explain the wonderful gifts of clairvoyance, clairaudience, healing by laying on of hands, or dreams. They either ignore them entirely or deny that they occur, or call all the phenomena of the spirit which they cannot understand and harmonize with their beloved theories, "psychic force," "motion," or "unconscious cerebration." I would as soon be a consistent Christian, with my whole soul resting on faith, and believe that woman was made of a man's rib, and the world flat, as to be a consistent Materialist, accepting their far-fetched dogmas of "psychic force," "motion," "unconscious cerebration," etc. Let me prognosticate. They who fix the limits to progression and evolution will, ere long, be compelled to pull up their dogmatical stakes and move on, or be left far in the rear. I do not wonder that such men crystallize into dogmatical fossils, all their knowledge materialized into a few facts and theories, beyond which they dare not or will not look.

Many times I hav asked Materialists to explain the wonderful fact that a little twig will grow sweet apples when grafted on a tree that grows sour apples. The closest analysis of the structure of the cells, the tissue of the wood, leaves, and fluids, do not reveal the slightest difference; and yet there is a mysterious germ power that maintains its identity and produces in the material which the "sour apple-tree" has drawn from the soil, the most wonderful metamorphosis. Again I say, Please explain it. If this mysterious power of individuality is materiality or motion, prove it. Assumption will not satisfy us. It simply proves to my mind that nature has a dual, if not a triple, existence, and that it is best not to claim that we know everything, when, in fact, we are just learning our A B C's.

We are told that "death is an eternal sleep," that "we die every night," that "death is no more to be dreaded than going to sleep every night." An enlightened people ought to consider themselves insulted whenever asked to accept such reasoning. There is a vast difference between death and sleep. Sleep is rest. Death is dissolution, disintegration, and decay. Nature sleeps or rests every winter, but there is no death. She will awake in the spring with new life and added power. When we retire to sleep we expect to awake in the morning. When we die we shall hav no expectation of ever awakening, if their theory is true. Asleep the body is warm, the pulse beats, respiration, etc., go on, and life is continued, showing the presence of the real man, the invisible builder. In death all the functions of the body cease, disintegration and decay quickly change it into a mass of corruption, seething with worms and reeking with the foulest odors. And this is "the blessed sleep of annihilation." Those who are made happy by such a belief are easily satisfied. It will not answer my purpose. I hav tasted knowledge, and the more I get the more I desire to hav; and having just learned the alphabet, and begun to read in the great book of universal knowledge, and knowing I hav an infinite capacity for growth, it is unreasonable that I should be cut off just as I begin to realize that the universe is a vast storehouse of knowledge, and I am filled with eager aspirations to explore it. The fact that we are permitted to begin this work, that we desire to continue it, and that our power of comprehension is expansive, is proof that we are to be gratified. Nature, the great mother of all, will not thus mock us.

I believe there is a law of eternal justice, a law of compensation, that will yield into the hands of the oppressed and unfortunate that rich heritage which nature has provided for all her children. The books must be balanced, if not in this world, then in the world to come. Every wrong must be righted, and every good deed receive its appropriate reward; the haughty, conceited, and purse-proud humbled, and the worthy poor exalted to positions where all can enjoy equal chances in the great highway of life. If this is not true, then eternal justice is a mockery, and compensation a myth. All wrongs are not righted, nor are all good deeds rewarded in this life, therefore another life beyond the grave is a necessity. Nature never abandons a job when it is half completed. We may for a time thwart her, but in the end it will be found she accomplishes all she undertakes. Her mills grind slowly, but always with a purpose. The silkworm and caterpillar, changing into the chrysalis, and from that into the miller and butterfly, are most beautiful illustrations of the power of nature to carry us through and beyond the crisis of death to a life where we can liv and eternally progress in harmony with the laws of our being and of the universe.

Mesmerism, or the power of mind over mind and mind over matter, as found in our physical organisms, is a most wonderful revelation. What that mysterious power is that goes out from the mind and captures and controls both mind and body of another person, none can tell. We call it will-power or magnetism. It certainly is not an attribute of the body or matter; therefore it must be of the mind or spirit. It leaves one organism and goes to another; therefore there is a something in man that is not confined to the limits of nor within his material organism. Again, if part of the spiritual elements can leave the body before death, can it not leave it entire at death?

The mesmeric subject and the spiritual medium are both evidently acted upon and controlled by the same power. The results are the same; therefore the cause must be identical or very similar, and acting in harmony with the same law. Now, as people cannot mesmerize themselves, it must follow that in both cases a mesmerizer is a necessity. In the one the mesmerizer is visible; in the other, invisible. No, I am mistaken; both are invisible, but one still abides within the fleshy tabernacle. There is practically no difference. The mesmeric subject is controlled by the spirit of the man that has not experienced the change, death; the medium, by the spirit that has experienced it and now abides in spirit life. If the will is a part of the mind or soul here, it goes with it to spirit life; therefore the man that possesses that power here will possess it hereafter.

Mesmerism is the key to Spiritualism. Without it no communications can ever be received from spirit life. Herein lies the great proof which ere long is destined to convince the world that man is a spirit, and that "the spirit of man is immortal."

Book Notice.

I hav just read "Superstition; the Religion of 'Believe or Be Damned,'" and find it brimful of life, enthusiasm, energy, and fire. It speaks plain truths in plain words, and givs the "sacred school book" particular fits. There is wit, humor, and good solid sense in the various articles it contains. It has a picture of Jehovah in all his wrath as a frontispiece, while the lurid fires of hell, horned and caudated devils, and a holy priest and sacred temples where myths are worshiped and impossible legends are told, ornaments its cover. Every member of every school board in the land should send at once for a copy, so that they may know their real duty in regard to the teaching of theological myths and mystery in the schools under their supervision. Every parent should read it, so as to be qualified to judge as to the benefits of the Bible as a school book. In fine, I think there are few who will not be able to get twenty-five cents' worth out of this unique and instructive little pamphlet.

It will be nice to send to pious neighbors and all who wish for "holy truths" plainly spoken and common sense arguments that saintly sophistry will vainly endeavor to controvert.

Liberal League Movement.—Items, Letters, etc.

Mr. Kersey Graves writes: "Mr. Green, please send two or three blanks, with which to procure L. L. charters, to D. Engler, Walton, Cass county, Ind. I want to form a League there."

Mr. J. B. Armstrong, of Ogdensburg, N. Y., writes that it is proposed to form a League in that county to be known as the St. Lawrence County Liberal League. He has ascertained that there are many Liberals in St. Lawrence county, and thinks a League of five hundred members can be organized there.

I am pleased with the following editorial notice clipped from Mind and Matter of the 20th inst.: "An application for a charter for a new Liberal League for Philadelphia was forwarded to the National Liberal League Secretary this week. It is greatly needed in this city just at this time." I am confident that our friends J. M. Roberts and Dr. R. C. Flower are entitled to much credit for this good work. May our Spiritualistic friends everywhere follow their noble example.

I cut the following deserving notice of our enthusiastic lecturer, O. A. Phelps, from the Daily Wonder of Parsons, Kansas: "Last night Prof. Phelps delivered the closing lecture of his course in this city. The professor is an able and polished gentleman, a fluent talker, and amply able to present his side of the question in a scholarly and interesting manner. There is not a taint of abuse or illiberalism about him, and, however much people may dislike his views, he is always bound to be a popular and effective speaker."

Mr. A. L. Thompson writes from Prairie City, Oregon: "I think an auxiliary Liberal League can be formed in this town, and I will attend to it as soon as I hav the time to spare. At the present time all the upper portion of John Day Valley is covered from three to eighteen inches with snow. Most of the farmers are without feed, and the stock is commencing to perish. Cattle are so poor that thousands will die in eastern Oregon if the snow should disappear to-morrow."

Mr. W. M. Robinson writes from Windsor, Kansas: "Please send me all the papers necessary to form an auxiliary League. I will do all I can to get up a League here, but it will be an up-hill business, for the country is thinly settled. Mr. Abbot is injuring us a little in the West by keeping Christians away from our Leagues, but he has no friends among the Liberals—not one. If the L. L. Congress is held at Lawrence I shall try and meet you and other friends there. Poor Abbot, Bundy, and Ellis are getting their just deserts out here. They can't shake the reputations of Mendum and Seaver in the least with Western Liberals. Their characters are established like the granite of the mountains. All hell can't injure their reputations. If Mrs. Slenker can be induced to attend the Congress I would be greatly pleased. I do want to see the greatest living woman, intellectually, of this country. She is doing a great amount of good."

Dr. O. F. Angell, of Lawrence, Kan., writes: "Having been appointed on the Committee of Arrangements I hav made a contract for the use of Bismarck Grove from Sept 1st to 7th, inclusive. The arrangements for railroad rates hav not yet been made, but Mr. Shelton assures me that the rates will be made satisfactory to us, and very low for car-load lots from Boston, New York, and all points East where a car load or more can be made up. The grove is being put in the best possible condition—enlarged and improved; a large hotel is being built on the grounds, and we hav a contract that board shall not exceed one dollar per day during the meeting. Tents will be let for from fifty cents to one dollar per day, according to size. We are sure we shall hav the largest gathering ever held in the West, especially if the Liberal League Congress meets with us, as I trust it may. And the low fare will, no doubt, bring thousands from the East, besides the delegates who desire to attend the Congress and see this country. I think we will hav organized by the 1st of September fifty or sixty Leagues. Brothers Campfield and O. A. Phelps are grand workers, and they are never one minute idle."

Gen. B. A. Morton, of New Haven, Conn., writes: "I am satisfied with the Liberal League platform as it is. I am opposed to incorporating in the same Freelovism, Socialism, Communism, or any other ism. I am opposed to indorsing as an organization any special doctrine or principle of any political, social, or religious party that does not tend directly to the advancement of the aims and interest of the National Liberal League, viz: Total separation of church and state; national protection for national citizens; Universal education the basis of universal suffrage. The position I took in my inaugural address when elected President of the National Liberal party, at Cincinnati, remains unchanged. With proper care the National Liberal League can become a power in the land for great good, and in order that it may become such it must be kept free and clear from all issues except such as are indicated in its platform. As an organization we hav nothing to do with the various political parties or peace-disturbing societies. Our object is to secure 'Justice for all! Privilege for none!' I am glad to know that the League is extending its usefulness so rapidly. We hav a fine working auxiliary League in this city of which I hav the honor of being President."

Dr. L. J. Russell, who will be remembered by the readers of The Truth Seeker as the man whom the Bell county Baptists so outrageously whipped a few years since, writes from Harrisville, Texas: "I hav written to a number of my Liberal friends in Texas urging them to organize Leagues; but so far I meet with no success. But still I am not wholly discouraged; I will keep trying. There is altogether too much apathy among the Liberals of the South; they don't fully appreciate the advantages of a thorough organization. While I know there are very many Liberals in Texas, yet, so far as I am able to learn, there are but five organizations and but two chartered Leagues. Our leading newspapers are generally very Liberal in tone and growing more so daily; and I hope soon to see the time when all the Liberals of the state will be fully aroused to a sense of duty, and Leagues spring up on all sides. I had a letter a few days since from Col. Norton, of Salado, in this county. He writes there are quite a number of Liberals in his vicinity. In reply I suggested that he organize a Liberal League, or at least to call a meeting of Liberals, and notify me and I would go and try to perfect an organization. I hope the Colonel will push the good work ahead; he is a perfect gentleman in every sense of the word and a man of intelligence, and will do our cause much good."

Mr. Robert S. Shoemaker writes from Rush, Pa.: "It is now nearly two years since I had any correspondence with you on the Liberal subject. At that time I was doing business for G. H. Weller, of Wyalusing. At the same time I was trying to organize the Liberal element in that town into a Liberal League. Mr. Weller learned of it and discharged me, and refused to settle with me or pay me for services rendered. I brought suit against him and recovered a little over five hundred dollars, more than I had offered to compromise for. He was compelled to pay, including costs, over eight hundred dollars. His only excuse for his conduct was that he could not conscientiously be engaged in business with a person of my religious belief, or, in other words, with an Infidel. He tried his best to get the evidence of my wife and daughters and myself rejected on account of our religious belief, but failed to make it work. I removed from Wyalusing to this place in September last, and am now in business with my father and brother, who are both Liberals. We are doing all we can for the Liberal cause. My brother and I are working the ground over thoroughly. We take the Investigator and The Truth Seeker, and hav paid for about twenty trial subscribers to The Truth Seeker ourselves, besides sending Bennett some donations. We are now circulating a petition to Congress for the repeal of the Comstock Postal laws. We hav about one hundred names on it, which is nearly one-third of the voters of this township. We hope to organize a League here the coming summer. Next fall we want to circulate a petition for the taxation of church property. This part of the county is very Liberal, and with some effort we can get the majority to sign a petition for taxing church property. We are flooding this section with Infidel literature, and it is having a good effect. I intend this summer to devote some time to working up the Liberal element."

H. L. Green.

P. S.—Every person who desires to be well posted in the principles of the Liberal League movement should send sixty cents to Messrs. Talbot & Co., 50 Larnard street, Detroit, Michigan, and procure a dozen copies of "Liberalism versus Superstition," by Hon. U. K. Booth. Reader, do not fail to do this.

A Baker's Dozen.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Yes, there are just about thirteen of the genuine F. E. Abbot "Liberal Union" followers now left to listen to his continuous stream of vituperation of the National Liberal League. One ancient judge, three or four effete Rev. Liberals, two or three figure-head presidents of "unions," a feeble secretary or two to fill up the list, and a trio of immaculate spinsters. To be sure he uses the name of Robert Ingersoll and one or two more of staunch National Liberal Leaguers (probably without their approval or consent) to giv some unction and body to the attenuated Union specter, which still make it discernable to the naked eye; but, in the language of scripture, "O Lord, how long; what wait we for?"

This pretense of an organization having no life, motion, or actual existence except in the hallucination of F. E. Abbot's brain is nothing, if not abusive. So let it rail on and call its betters what it will. The National Liberal League, respected for the average talent, character, and integrity of its members, will go on conquering and to conquer the regard of the American people. It makes no claim of "godlike perfection," but is human, and partakes of the virtues and faults natural to humanity, but aiming to enlarge the opportunities of all to grow; it welcomes to its ranks the earnest, the honest, the bold, and the true—men like D. M. Bennett, who "own up" and lie not, even when in prison, and thereby take hold of the sympathies of all admirers of open-hearted manhood.

Let us press on in the Liberal work, and it will not be long before the last deluded "Liberal" Rev. will open his eyes to realize that he is living in a progressive world, and that he must imbibe the elixir of liberality or die alone, and his petrified utterance of "touch me not or I shall be contaminated," will be the narrow winding-sheet in which he is laid away, odorless, valueless, and friendless.

Yours for breadth, Henry Damon,

"The Bible of To-Day."

"The Bible of To-Day" is a peculiar but instructive work, powerful in stating old things in a new light. Mr. Chadwick has attacked the Bible in a very peculiar but striking manner. He is certainly a great Biblical scholar and has spent much time in studying authors thoroughly who hav written for and against the "holy book." It is altogether a different work from any I ever read. If any one be anxious to get a thorough knowledge of the history of the Bible I know of no work that will giv a general information better than the one in question. Mr. Chadwick may be termed a scripturian.

A Plea for Unity.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It would seem from the tenor and spirit of many communications that a Radical is nothing if not belligerent. If there is sufficient difference in any two to designate them by different names, there must straightway be a pitched battle between them. That while, in fact, their main life-purpose is the same, and the means they use very similar, their diversity in methods, with a different summing up of conclusions, too often engenders acrimony and bitterness. An enlarged measure of truth, increased opportunities for good, a clearer vision to detect and avoid evil, work little in favor of that toleration, that is as anxious to hear as be heard, as desirous of being criticised as it is to question the opinions of others, and as ready to concede a position as it is to defend one. Radicals, of all others, should be aware of and recognize this fact, that free minds change their opinions more frequently than any other class, are least fixed in many of their conclusions; for the simple reason that opinions are only esteemed useful as they aid human development. We discard opinions as readily as we cast off worn-out garments, when we perceive them to be errors. The great aim of our lives is to place the mind and body in a condition to receive most readily all influences that tend to their well-being.

I do not think any well-wisher of humanity will take exceptions to these affirmations. In view of the necessity for unity on the part of every friend of true Liberalism, as well as from the fact of the magnitude of the work before us, is it not the part of wisdom to try and use the best methods and most clearly-defined efforts to push forward the cause of human liberty?

We are certainly in no condition to fight over our little differences, while the church and state are united in a twin-censorship of the press, when free speech is not tolerated, while the world's saviors are imprisoned, and a system of espionage encouraged under the guise of religion, and with a pretense for public virtue and private purity; using means to carry out its base purposes that violate every element of justice and set at defiance all that ennobles man, woman, and child. I desire a union of all our strength, to wring from our opponents the same liberty of thought and expression they claim for themselves. I would hav repealed all laws that interfere with the free use of the United States mails. I would hold no question that directly or indirectly concerns humanity outside the pale of thorough and searching investigation. I would ask neither gods nor men how I should think nor what myself or others should think or say, and would only limit a person's right to do as he pleases, to make it harmonize with the equal rights of others and the principle of universal equity. As we hav so much at stake it seems wise to imitate the spirit and method of the Garrisonian Abolitionists.

They concentrated all their energies to destroy slavery. Every shade of religious or non-religious believers worked together in perfect accord for the accomplishment of this one object. 'Twas this that made their yearly meetings so important and their auxiliaries so effective. The simple desire of justice to the oppressed was a bond of union that no shades of conviction in other directions could efface or mar.

Such being a well-established fact, may not our Spiritualistic and Materialistic friends learn wisdom thereby? May not Bros. Sherman, Deed, Gorsuch, and others, illustrate a better spirit of toleration and catholicity? 'Tis not possible for any two persons to see any object at precisely the same angle of vision. No two minds can perceive at a single (mental) glance any thought, opinion, or question as a whole or in detail in like proportion and completeness. Diversity, dissimilarity, and varied individuality complete the universal. Unity and accord are the result of judicious blending—the giving that is receiving, the losing to find, the sacrifice of selfishness to perfect self. All nature is a standing rebuke and reproof to petty irritableness on the part of any who contend for pet opinions in an unkind vein. 'Twould be as wise to find fault with a man for preferring green to scarlet, or a cube to a sphere, as to take him to task for being in the wrong or superstitious on account of his conviction in favor of Materialism or Spiritualism. There is no wrong in either as a matter of belief, but one or both may be at variance with the truth, and superstitious by intolerance and worship of pet dogmas. The church does not monopolize all the superstitions, does not exhibit all the narrowness, is not the only party that likes to persecute. With our advantages, it is both shameful and discreditable that we fail to represent by our lives and conduct our appreciation of the blessings and benefits we enjoy by rising above the narrowness of our opponents, and for which on their part we are so ready to hurl our Liberal rocks.

There is no wrong in any belief or opinion honestly entertained, and he or she is the bigot who takes any offense with another for failing to perceive as they do. Orthodox and heterodox hav equal rights (or are entitled to them), and are entitled to equal respect and consideration. What right hav I to find fault with my Methodist or Catholic neighbor any more than he has to find fault with me? Our sincerity, most likely, is at par. Only when we seek to cross the line of each other's right is there room for criticism and exception. We should doubtless reason together, and compare opinions, to see whose views are most in accord for human well-being. But if we can not do this it is not our province to cry bigot or simpleton. We do not fight the church for its belief, but for what we affirm are the actions as the fruit of it. If the priesthood were ever ready to accord us an open field and a fair fight, never seeking to misrepresent and persecute we should hav nothing but friendship and words of love for them. Catholicism has its pope, Protestantism has its pope (the Bible), and too many Radicals hav science for their pope. There are times when an impartial eye will see little difference in either. Judging from the intolerance displayed by all, we who talk about God as freely as we mention the deities of polytheism, and regard with no sanctity systems that hav been esteemed sacred for centuries, hav a very flippant way of talking about science, as though its conclusions were infallible, and that all who dared to question them were simpletons, and ignorant. What is science in its deductive and inductive aspect but a system of investigation and experiments regarding the operations of nature? It is, without question, an important factor in human knowledge and general utility. Those, however, who deem it as an unerring guide are with the Catholics and Protestants in mental subserviency and slavish submission.

Science is quite as changeable as theology, and many of its professors are as dogmatic as Luther or Calvin. To show the instability of science, let me introduce one simple illustration. Let it be the two theories of light. First is the emission theory of Sir Isaac Newton, who was almost esteemed a god. This theory was supported by the great abilities of Laplace, Malus, Biot, Brewster, and others. Huyghens and the celebrated mathematician Euler were the first to oppose it, holding that light, like sound, was a product of wave-motion. Dr. Young of England, by experiment, demonstrated the fallacy of Newton's emission theory, and, according to John Tyndall, placed the undulatory or wave-motion theory on a sure foundation. Prof. Josiah P. Cooke, of Harvard University, says that he cannot agree with those who regard the wave theory of light as an established principle of science. General Pleasanton of Philadelphia, by a series of experiments, makes sorry work of Tyndall's "sure foundation," and the probabilities are that the undulatory or wave theory will hav its successor. It is said of Madam Thiers that she declined to publish the posthumous works of her husband, M. Thiers (ex-president), among which were his writings on science. It was suggested to her that it might be wise, before doing so, to submit them to the leading scientists of Paris. She did so, and they told her it would not do to publish them, for it would ruin her husband's reputation, as they were simply exploded theories. As regards Spiritualism, scientists hav treated it with the most shameful disrespect. Faraday was Calvin's parallel.

M. A. N. Aksakof, in an able article on mediumism and the St. Petersburg scientific committee, says that "the phenomena chase the scientists, and the scientists run away from the phenomena." Many Spiritualists were well-read in Materialism, many were outspoken Materialists. The phenomena hav convinced them of continued life. Some Spiritualists hav reasoned themselves into conditions whereby a material film has covered their spiritual vision. Bro. Jamieson is among the number. What, then, shall I love or respect Bro. Jamieson less? Not I! He is honest; I know it! I am an honest Spiritualist; I know that too! I also know that a belief in continued life does not lessen my desire to make our rudimental existence pure, free, good, and noble. Who is not aware that Prof. Hare, the two Owens', and a great army of their kind, retained [all the sweetness of their dispositions, purity of their actions, and intense enthusiasm for the well-being of the race, after their conviction of the truth (to them) that this was but the beginning of spirit life—but the bud and seed-time of our mentality—as when they held that all individual entity began and ended with material organization? Let us enjoy peacefully for a season these side issues, or if they are discussed, let it be with the spirit of justice and love, so grand and noble, that wrings respect from our most bitter opponents. We hav copied too long their methods; let us henceforth make manifest in all we say and do the beauty and truth of the principles we advocate, and the object we seek to accomplish.

Pious Accusations.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Is it not about time that clerical defamers stop their accusations, and try to prove to the reading public the truth of some of their charges?

To commence, let us take up the Freelove idea. For our part we cannot see why one of them should be so very much hurt about it. No Infidel has as yet gone deep enough into the matter to disgrace himself with crime; and if he has, he has known enough to keep out of jail, and not to hav alarmed the neigborhood with the scandal. Can the clergy say as much? Every week now brings its proofs that the very men who are crying so loudly "Mad dog" are themselves the most affected. In face of facts daily coming up can they deny that Freelove is not a part of their creed?

To lay a charge of this nature upon the shoulders of an enemy does not, in our way of thinking, excuse the crime in themselves. Prudence should dictate, Better keep still.

To carry the thing still farther: It is the purest nonsense to accuse others of crime of which the accuser is also guilty. To judge others by self may be just in regard to self, while the rankest injustice to the accused.

This thing has gone so far that we feel that their pious accusers should prove their words. Giv us the names of these Infidels who are so wicked. Who are they who ruin the homes of brothers under the name of morality and piety? Who are they who rob the orphan, and their employers, of immense wealth? Who are they who are brought weekly into court charged with infamous crimes? Giv us the names of a few of the rascals. If the Infidels' ranks are filled with such vermin we want to know it, and when once this is proved we want nothing more to do with them.

Pious Joe, here is a good chance for you. Point us out these "cancer-planters." Name our Beechers, Averys, and Freemans. A little proof here in this line will clear the fo amazingly. Go to work at once and make this plain unto us, or sit down and keep still.

Now, Warbling Joe, and others of your ilk, let me ask you one plain question, Do you know what shame is? If you do, let us see you practice so as to be thought not shameless by well-disposed people.

A word of advice: Get some of Colgate's soap, and wash your own robes clean before you undertake the robes of others. Let us see you do a good job at home before we employ you.

Another word: Do you know that abuse is not argument? Do you know it hurts your cause every time you use it? Do you know it has no weight with any reasonable person? Do you know it confesses you hav no case? Do you know to accuse others of crimes you are guilty of yourselves does not lift that crime from your own shoulders? Do you know, being yourself guilty of a crime, to accuse another of like offenses makes you look the more contemptible? To mingle Christ, morality, and such things, with your abuse stamps you at once a hypocrite, knave, and even something worse.

If you do not know these things, then we do, and so does every other reasonable person. We make bold to tell you these things plainly, and hope you will heed them if you hav any wisdom left.

We want you to understand this thing plainly. We do not apologize for crime, neither do we defend it under any circumstances. Yet we are disgusted every time we hear clergymen whose robes are not over clean talking about these things. We think such matter it would be a very excellent policy for them to let strictly alone.

Now, Noisy Joe, just bring out your proofs, backed by truth, and stop lying. Do this, or subside at once. We are as anxious to find out these men as you are to expose them. We are confident you hav no case, but if you hav, present it in legal form. Now, just let science alone one Monday morning and attend strictly to this matter.

Prof. Denton Criticised.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been an attentive reader of The Truth Seeker for three years. Among its contributors highly esteemed by me is Prof. Denton; and his article in your issue of Feb. 14th impels me to giv you some of my thoughts and ask a few questions, hoping some one will answer.

The Professor says, "Everywhere we find law, law and its manifestations; nowhere do we find miracle."

Again he says, "And out of the same law and the same process of unfolding and progression is developed a Lyell."

Again, "If I am told that behind all this impressive universal manifestation of law there is an intelligent ruling spirit, I recognize the truth of the assertion."

If I am not mistaken, the Professor believes in the eternal nature of matter. Then if the material universe is eternal in its nature, are not the laws governing matter also eternal? Is not the one as reasonable as the other? If then the laws governing matter are co-eternal with matter, is there any need of getting "behind all this impressive manifestation of law" to prop it up with "an intelligent ruling spirit?" The fact that these laws hav developed a Lyell and Humboldt is to my mind no more evidence of an intelligent ruler than the development of a fish, a scorpion, or a flower. I see in nature the working of law, but blind, unpitying, irrational law.

While I write there are doubtless tens of thousands of human beings and other animals suffering various degrees of agony—starving, freezing, drowning, murdering, teeth and claws tearing flesh and crunching bones of living, writhing creatures.

The Professor asks, "Do not the hawks and eagles also need a breakfast?"

In the name of suffering and unnumbered millions of harmless doves, sparrows, rabbits, lambs, etc., that hav died most painful deaths that other animals' hunger might be appeased—in the name of all that is merciful and humane, I ask, Why is this? Where is your beneficent ruler? Why could not their natures as well hav been formed to feed upon herbage and inanimate objects? A human being with power to prevent, who would permit such cruelties, would be thought a beastly monster. To me, evidently, if there is an intelligent ruler that rules, he is either infinitely cruel or powerless to prevent suffering. Respectfully,

C. T. Daniels.

P. S.—If, as Bro. Chapman says, a few spirits can move a table, a good many should be able to move a house. Let us hav the evidence. E. T. D.

Hypocrisy—Clerical and Laic.—The high and titled ranks among the clergy, though they may not believe all that is taught in the liturgy (or any other authorized exposition of religious belief), must profess it in public, that the lower ranks may be kept in order. They bow the knee, that the vulgar, taught by their example, may do the like, and may really believe what is pretended only by their superiors; and, what is worse—according to the newest fashion—the man who professes Infidelity among his confidential associates is the very person whoi s the most systematical in enforcing orthodoxy upon his inferiors. He revels in his liberty, and makes it his boast that he has freed himself from all superstitious shackles, at the same time that he holds it for "very stuff of conscience" not to let in the least glimmering of light upon his servants and those who are placed in a station below him.—Godwin's Essays.

So far as magnitude of work is concerned, the great Chinese wall surpasses everything in ancient and modern times, of which there is any trace. The pyramids of Egypt re nothing compared to it.

Synopsis of Remarks at the Funeral of Brother David Porter.

BY THE REQUEST OF THE PITTSBURGH LIBERAL LEAGUE, FEBRUARY 18, 1880.

SISTERS AND BROTHERS: We meet to-day upon what we consider a very solemn occasion, and it sometimes appears to me that upon such an occasion the most appropriate conduct is absolute silence, as every heart knows its own bitterness; but when we take all things into consideration, it may be best that we should relieve our internal grief by giving expression to our feelings.

By our side lies our brother silent in death. What were his sympathies during life, you who are his most intimate friends know far better than I can express; but this I do know, that he was a man of a broad mind and no narrow bigot, but a believer in the universal brotherhood of man.

Was he consistent with his belief? Let his actions in life answer. He was associated with that class of men who labored through opposition and persecution for the liberation of those that were held in physical bondage, claiming that all were the children of our common father.

Had he any authority for such a belief more than the conviction of his own broad and cultivated mind? It is recorded in our language that eighteen hundred years ago it was boldly asserted that God made all men of one blood. (Acts xvii, 26.) These being his convictions, he was no respecter of persons, but sought to elevate all men and giv them an equal chance in life.

Had he any authority in this respect aside from the convictions of his own broad nature? We are also informed away back in the past that one who looked upon his own nation as being the special people of the common father, exclaimed, "I perceive of a truth that God is no respecter of persons" (Acts x, 34.)

Our departed brother, who had dedicated his life to search for and practice the truth as far as his broad mind could grasp it, had he not built upon a sure foundation, need we be surprised that when persecution and affliction beat upon this fabric it did not fall, being founded upon a rock?

He not only sought deliverance from physical bondage, but he strove to shake the shackles of bigotry and superstition from his own mind and the minds of his fellow-men, knowing that the truth would make both him and them free. (John viii, 31.)

Now, what shall we say of such a man? Shall we look upon his life and death with suspicion and fear? Nay, verily, such men are the salt of the earth. Shall we, then, not honor him in his life and also in his death? Was he not a practical believer in true manhood, who fully indorsed and practically lived out the sentiment, "It is the mind that makes the man, and not merely the physical appearance?" And may we not say to his bereaved widow and children, that are left here to stay a little longer, Dry up your tears; your loss is his eternal gain? And need we manifest any surprise that he should sympathize with that class of men who declare that the world is their country and their religion to do good?

MEMORIAL

OF THE PITTSBURGH LIBERAL LEAGUE, IN REMEMBRANCE OF DAVID PORTER, AN AGED AND HIGHLY-ESTEEMED MEMBER OF THE LEAGUE.

The greatest blessing man can bestow upon his fellow-being is to cultivate the inherent properties of his own mind, and transmit his experience to those around him. Such a man is not only a benefit to himself but to his race, for he is a living witness of the truth that man does not liv by bread alone, but by seeking after truth, knowledge, and moral power. However humble may be the position of such a man in society, it is certain that his influence on those around him will kindle desires in them to grow beyond the common wants of uncultivated humanity, and aspire to elevate themselves to that state of moral susceptibility which will bring them to a more enlightened perception of their mission in this life. The decease of men, who hav exerted such influences on those who hav been acquainted with them will be deeply regretted. Family, friends, and associates all feel to experience a serious loss, and each feels a desire to pay some tribute of respect to their memory. In compliance with these feelings, the Liberal League offers this humble memorial in remembrance and honor of David Porter. He was one of the oldest and most esteemed members of the League, and a regular attender as long as his health would permit, and discharged his duty faithfully and honorably. His addresses to the League were of superior intelligence. Whether the subject was religion, science, or politics, he always displayed an intimate acquaintance with it, and generally fortified his position with facts and supported it by philosophical and moral reasoning. He possessed deep penetration of thought and a high degree of moral perception and wise discrimination. The Liberal League deeply regrets the loss of so valued a member, but, though its loss is great, the League is aware that those who hav had a nearer acquaintance with the deceased hav experienced a far greater loss—the loss of a husband, a father, a protector, and a friend—to whom the League feels urged to this expression of deep sympathy for the bereaved wife, children, relations, and friends; therefore,

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the bereaved family of our departed fellow-member as a token of respect and esteem to his memory, and an expression of our sympathy for them in the loss of their earthly protector; also,

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be entered in the League minute-book as a tribute of respect due to him from the League.

Signed on behalf of the League,

What is Liberalism?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I do not desire to intrude myself upon your columns, but after a careful perusal of Gunther's reply to Sotheran, I am prompted to ask the above question.

Liberals accuse the church of not fairly discussing questions at issue. The church either stops discussion entirely, or, when it cannot do that, it assumes an air of exalted wisdom, and endeavors, by sweeping assumptions and personal derision, to silence opposition. Can it be possible that there are Liberals who are guilty of the same mistake? Surely not. The very soul of Liberalism, as I understand it, consists of a due respect to the convictions of others. It matters not how erroneous we may conceive them to be, we should still remember that they are the convictions of a fellow-man, and entitled to respectful notice, if any at all. We should also remember that each idea, however false it may be, contains a germ of truth, without which it would never hav existed. The most profound of human knowledge is, at best, but fragments of the grand sum total of truth, and it is not strange that in endeavoring to fit these fragments together man has ever been involved in error. And while it is imperative that we defend ourselves to the best of our ability against the imperfections of our fellow-man, as well as our own, it is not right to denounce him for those imperfections any more than to denounce ourselves.

It is certainly a mistake for Mr. Gunther to "saw off" Mr. Skinner and Mr. Sotheran in the way he does. He treats them as almost beneath his notice. Mr. Skinner's article was quite a plain, unostentatious statement of what he believes to be facts, worthy in every respect of a candid consideration. There may be more credit in money than Mr. Gunther is aware of. He will not deny that paper money is credit, and if he examines the matter carefully he may detect credit mixed up with the value of silver and gold. The demonetization of silver by only a few nations appeared to somewhat affect its value, and if all nations were to demonetize both silver and gold how does he know that their value would not shrink to a third of what it is at present. At any rate it is fair to assume that their value would be lessened by depriving them of their monetary uses. So perhaps, Mr. Gunther, our friend Skinner is not such a confirmed lunatic as you imagine he is, and I make a move that you rescind your ban and allow him to write occasionally for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

You say there are no laurels to be won in disputing with Mr. Sotheran, and that hereafter you will ignore his "scribbling." Surely no Liberal in his right mind could utter such a sentiment. What are the "laurels" you are after? Hav you any greater desire than the evolution of truth? I am afraid, Mr. Gunther, you hav caught this sentiment from some orthodox preacher, and got it mixed in with your Liberalism unawares. You intimate that Mr. Sotheran is actuated by self-interest, and therefore unworthy of candid treatment. I would like to see a person who is not mainly actuated by self-interest, either imaginary or real. Self-interest is the very root and foundation of individualism. I take it for granted that every person who advocates anything is in some way or other interested in what he advocates. A doctrine is either right or wrong in and of itself, and not according to the interestedness or disinterestedness of its advocates.

You said in your former article that you are no novice in the Liberal cause, that you hav been through all the issues and hav been an Atheist over twenty years. Ah, there is where you make your mistake! Atheism is not Liberalism. A man may be an Atheist and yet be as illiberal and bigoted in his ideas as any priest in the world. Liberalism stands upon the broad and generous platform of humanity, where all the isms and schisms and dogmas in existence become matters of secondary importance. The greatest fault I find with orthodoxy is that it takes one of the isms and makes a god of it. Liberals cannot afford to make this mistake.

It cannot surely be Liberalism to designate any human beings as "dock-ranters," "sand-lotters," etc. What made them what they are? Science says organism and environment. You and I might hav been "dock-ranters" had we been born and raised under favorable conditions. That we are not should stimulate feelings of sympathy and charity for those who are so unfortunate. While self-preservation may compel us, as a choice of evils, to fight them, yet we should never forget that they are our fellow-beings, depraved as they are by ignorance, superstition, and tyranny. Even if you are acquainted with them, you certainly do not pretend to hav explored the mysteries of their evolution, and you surely do not wish to assent to the Christian dogma of total depravity.

I am not criticising your article, but only its spirit. While I admire its independence of thought, I detect that spirit of arrogance and intolerance which has ever been the bane of Freethought, and which has done more to suppress truth than all other factors combined. I do not claim this was your motive in writing it; far from it. I can see how, under the pressure of an overflowing strength of conviction, we are prompted to use strong language. "Bulldozing" is an element of human nature, but it must be restrained. I can also see that such is the custom of the world. We may call ourselves Liberals, and honestly endeavor to be such, but we cannot, without repeated efforts, shake off the shackles which hav been riveted upon us by the prejudices and bigotry which surround us. I myself am a frequent victim to the Moloch of prejudice. In my late article in reply to "Inquirer," I see that, in an unguarded moment, I hav used the words "interest suckers" and "drones," and yet I know that many noble men are compelled to become such without any special fault of theirs, because, under our present imperfect financial system, there is no better opening for the investment of their means. It is a weakness, for I am sure such epithets neither convince nor awaken an interest in the subject discussed. Burns formulated the fundamental principle of Liberalism when he said, and Thomas Paine exemplified it during the French Revolution when he said, "Destroy the king but spare the man." It means death to error, but life and good will to the victim.

"A man's a man for a' that."

An Open Letter to F. E. Abbot.

FRIEND ABBOT: Even at the risk of being classed with the "unscrupulous vilifiers who every week attack us in THE TRUTH SEEKER," I venture to ask thee, in all honesty of intention, a few simple questions that hav been weighing upon my mind ever since I read that long article some months ago in the Index in favor of the whipping-post as the cheapest and most effectual preventive of stealing. Now I wish to know if whipping is really an outgrowth of enlightened ethical culture? If it is possible that there is not even one among all that pure, high-toned, moral class of Free Religionists that read thy paper who has enough of that broad, humanitarian, charitable element of true Liberalism in his make-up to induce him to plead for the poor unfortunates who are less favorably organized and circumstanced than themselves? Is it not inferable that you all indorse the article, since no one has, to my knowledge, even attempted to speak a word in opposition to it? Can it be possible that among all that long array of prominent names whose owners pay so much for the privilege of being made morally pure and good by the Index, not one can be found on the side of the poor prisoner—the victim of circumstances that conspired to make him precisely what he is? Are you all content to hav your records go down to posterity as individuals who tacitly agreed to hav men, women, and children brutally whipped for the trivial offense of appropriating some trifling possession of another?

Just take it home to thyself, friend Abbot, and imagine thou sees a tender and delicate boy or girl tied to a stake, and a great, brutal, coarse, muscular man cutting into the white, quivering flesh of the bare back with the thong of rawhide, while the cries of the helpless victim ring out upon the air and fall upon the hearts of the spectators as a piercing, stinging pain. There stands thy wife, mother, sister, and innocent little tender children looking on and shuddering with horror and anguish; and yonder a group of reckless boys jibing and jeering at the sad scene; while over the whole hover the angels of peace, love, and charity, pleading for an ethical culture that shall hav a few elements of pure humanity in its ingredients.

"Cheaper!" Yes, it's cheaper to kill all law-breakers, all criminals, all lunatics, and all drunkards, than it is to reform them. Cheaper, that is, for present purposes! But how about the seed sown? How about the crop that is to be harvested from the brutal, inhuman, savage laws that now stain the record-books of so many of our legislative halls, here in the land of the free and the home of the brave? Yes, it is brave to strike a bound and helpless child, a man whose instincts hav been warped by unfortunate surroundings, or a woman who steals bread for her starving little ones. I think, if some of you silent non-protesters will liv as I do, in the midst of whipping-posts, and within the very sound of the blows, and could hear the brutal laugh and cruel jest at the expense of the poor victim, and realize all the evil that grows out of this debasing, degrading, horrible thing, you would cry out as even I now do. If this be the fruits of "ethical culture," of superior "morality and purity," may the shade of the man thou hast so vilified and condemned—the tender, loving, gentle, and humane D. M. Bennett—the martyr to tyrannical priestcraft and ignorant judicial power, preserve me from all further contact with such pharisaical selfish purity and goodness as this. I believe in a pure morality, in intelligence, and in all that is noble, beautiful, and good. And are not these qualities far oftener found amongst the common people, the uncultured and unlearned, than in those who so emphatically declare, "I am holier than thou?"

These in their unlettered ignorance may be rough, coarse, or even vulgar; but they hav warm, living hearts, true and tender affections, noble and unselfish impulses, and a beautiful holy sympathy that crops out all along through the trials and temptations of life's cares and burdens, and gilds over many a rude, unpolished surface, hiding the deformity even as the beautiful green, tender-clinging ivy hides the ruins of Time's iron fingers on the old oak's decaying trunk, or on the tottering walls of the stately but fast crumbling castle. Infidel Liberalism is to my view teaching a purer, nobler, and more generous morality, and a higher, more ennobling and truly tender charity than has ever yet been taught by any and all religions, not even excepting Free Religion itself. It does not seek to deny the errors and mistakes of its leaders or followers, but it covers them with the broad, loving mantle of considerate charity, and aids, assists, and sustains every stumbling toiler in his efforts to step up on higher ground and do better and purer work. To cut ourselves off from those whom we think less good or perfect than ourselves is not the way in which to improve and make better our brothers and sisters of earth. We all need each other's presence, support, and counsel. No one is sufficient unto himself. All reformers who are in advance of the age are misunderstood by those who do not see as far as they do. But it is cheering to know that those in the rear will one day stand where the advance guard now stands, and the pioneers will pass onward and still onward forever and forever. With this bright prospect cheering us we will do our work honestly and faithfully, and while our enemies fling out what they term opprobrious, epithets, such as Freelover, Socialist, etc., the true Liberal goes quietly and patiently to work, accepts the names and makes them into titles of honor and badges of morality by living so purely, justly, and beautifully as to render them distinctive epithets of honest integrity of character and virtuous nobility of soul. And now, what sayest thou, friend Abbot? Dost thou not think it would be better to cease firing into the camp of the workers for freedom, and join ranks with us, and all pull together for truth, humanity, and a pure Liberalism, and work against Bibles, priests, tyrants, and whipping-posts, remembering always "That a man's a man for a' that?"

Washington Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Hon. G. L. Fort, of Illinois, in the Forty-fifth Congress, said: "It has been said and is believed that representatives of the Rothschilds hav visited this country privately and secretly for some purpose. I stated in the last Congress that a Mr. Ernest Seyd, an agent of European bondholders, had visited this country for some purpose in 1872–73, and that he spent the winter in Washington and New York, and that he probably knew more about the reason of demonetization than the people did. No person then or since has disputed the truth of this statement. I hav no doubt that August Belmont, a prominent financier of New York, could, if he would, inform the country something about how it came about that silver was domonetized in America. Not long since, the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, said that I was the first in the last Congress to raise the cry and charge that there had been a conspiracy against silver, and that I had earned the name of the 'Howling Communist of the Prairies,' which was given me the other day on this floor. Mr. Chittenden, of New York, also said: 'In less than one year from this time the indignant people of the West will drive him (Mr. Fort) out from among them, and he will be flying from the wrath of a people whom he has misled and deceived, and he will be calling forth to the rocks and mountains to fall upon him and hide him.' Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen might as well keep their seats and their tempers. Hit birds always flutter. I will say to them when driven out, unless the people of New York mend their politics, especially on the silver question, and the people of Brooklyn mend their religion, especially those led by Beecher, I will not seek refuge in either of their cities. A gentleman over on the other side of the chamber says to me that I am neither a Republican nor a Democrat. Mr. Hewitt told us that our national bonds are being returned to us by the ship-load, and spoke of a lot of fifty millions that had been sent back by our alarmed creditors in consequence of this silver agitation, and in anticipation that this bill (the remonetization of silver) might become a law. I am, indeed, sorry for these New York gentlemen, but I am too stupid to be alarmed. For one I welcome our bonds back to our shores, and I wish they would all come. I hardly think our creditors will return the bonds unless they get paid for them; and if our people can buy them and bring them home, all right. If we owed no debt abroad, but owed it to our own citizens, we would be more prosperous. If we were not required to send abroad a hundred million of coin annually to pay interest on our debt, we would not be troubled about specie resumption—it would hav been reached long ago. It would be better for the county to pay five per cent interest at home than to pay four per cent abroad. So let our bonds come, and may favorable trade-winds waft them to us. The subsidized New York press has abused us without mercy. Every opprobrious epithet has been exhausted; yes, and the pulpit has been subsidized to denounce and anathematize us. One Rev. Frederick Frothingham, of New York, in a Sabbath sermon, calls some of us by name, and then tells his flock that we are violators of the public faith, clippers of the national credit, swindlers, cheats, wild men of the West, and worse than thieves, and applies many other pet names to us not found in the gospel. And the pious and exemplary Henry Ward Beecher hurls anathemas at us from the pulpit, and excommunicates us from the society of all respectable people. He has an annual salary of only $20,000, and I suppose he thinks it is legitimate to hire himself to the gold men to abuse us for a few thousands extra. No wonder he has in his own wish and opinion abolished future punishment. It is not consoling for some men to believe otherwise. Leading New York journals, chiefly owned and controlled by Jay Gould and August Belmont, hav daily teemed with falsehood, slander, and abuse."

Hon. T. T. Crittenden, of Missouri, said: "The President having shown such an unusual interest in the bondholders' welfare, and so little appreciation of the taxpayers, let me show what these gentlemen paid for the bonds when originally purchased [referring to a table prepared by Senator Vorhees, of Indiana, showing an average of about forty cents on the dollar]. The bonds thus discounted were sold as greenback bonds, with the fixed belief that they were to be paid, principal and interest, in greenbacks. The 'slush' men and the scoundrels got possession of Congress. First, a bill was passed changing the terms of the contract. Silver was demonetized before the people knew the oligarchy had triumphed, and the laws demanded that all the bonds should be paid in gold. We never heard from a president or the bondholders before the alarm of repudiation, broken faith, and sacred obligations. They were then too busy robbing the people—in clover too deep and rich. Then they thanked God that they were not like other men. No people on the face of this earth, with such immense productive capacities, hav been treated by their rulers and legislative bodies as hav been the people of this country. The bonds of this country were originally paid in greenbacks; then, by Republican legislation in 1869, they were made payable in coin; then again in gold; and now, because the people are demanding that some of the steps of past legislation be retraced, the President, with an easy inclination towards the bondholders, says, I veto the bill."

Hon. J. E. Kenna, of West Virginia, said: "It is well known that every ring, swindle, and job which looks to legislation, either state or national, for its promotion, finds a way to reach the legislative pulse and to inspire the legislative heart. It is worse than folly to suppose that an act can be passed here to affect directly or indirectly the great interest involved in the bonds, currency, and metals of this country without the perceptible influences of that power which organized capital can always command. Members are reached through every available avenue. Petitions are signed by men who never read their contents. A single employer commands obedient co-operation on the part of thousands employed. Constituencies are manipulated in the great money centers with the specious glare of torches and the strain of martial music; and in Massachusetts even the churches, desecrating the temples which ought to be dedicated to the service of God, divert their appeals from the throne of grace for mercy to the bar of this house for gold. Who can stand up here and say, with truth, that the corruption which gold can buy has not tainted the very atmosphere which surrounds us? The bondholder and money-changer is here. With gilded livery he rides the public thoroughfares, and in conscious power he invades these halls. He dictates the law that shall control the destinies of forty-five millions of freemen, and comes down from Lombard and Wall streets to view the performances of this body as a herdsman would regard the cattle upon his hillsides, glorying in their ownership in fee simple forever. Where the country is, how it got there, and how to redeem it, are questions worthy indeed of a better day and generation than this. It is in the hands of the goldmongers. It got there through the influence of a press, subsidized to divert from real issues at the polls the minds of the unsuspecting masses."

Hon. J. M. Bright, of Tennessee, said: "We will say that there are fifty banks and gold-brokers, English and American, that hav five millions of gold on deposit in the vaults of the banks. They hav also hoarded five millions of treasury notes. On the day appointed they appear before the Secretary of the Treasury and propose to buy five millions of bonds. Gold being never moved in large transactions, the Secretary accepts the gold checks; but just here the syndicate presents five millions of legal tender notes for redemption, and the Secretary exchanges the gold checks for legal tender notes. The result of the transaction is the syndicate has the interest-bearing bonds and the gold unmoved in the vaults of the banks, the Secretary has the legal tenders, which are carried to destruction account and burnt up, and the people hav lost their money from circulation and hav gained a new burden in the interest of the bonds. This can be repeated until the whole legal-tender notes are absorbed, the vaults of the bankers filled with the interest-bearing bonds, and five million dollars hav done the whole work."

On the 29th day of January, 1878, Hon. B. F. Butler introduced in the House a memorial from a conference of twenty-three churches of Boston, Dorchester, Roxbury, Milton, Brookline, Quincy, Dedham, and Jamaica Plains, in Massachusetts, submitting resolutions in opposition to the Bland Silver Bill. After having the same read, Mr. Butler said:

"Mr. Speaker, will you hav the kindness to send me the Bible from your desk?" (Laughter.)

The clerk read from the second chapter of St. John:

13. And the Jews' passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

14. And found in the temple those that sold oxen, sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting.

15. And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep and the oxen, and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables.

16. And said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence, make not my father's house a house of merchandise.

17. And his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.

Mr. Butler: After the rebuke of the master I hav no further word to say. (Great laughter and applause.)

"Show Your Colors."

MR. E. C. WALKER, Sir: You ask me in a late TRUTH SEEKER to show my colors. My name was placed as one of the vice-presidents of the Liberal League of America without my knowledge or consent. There it has been in known silence for the following reasons: If the members of the "prodigal" League can derive consolation for the sin of secession by the vice-president monopoly of my name, I am so far just liberal enough to indulge them, especially when I know I had nothing to do in the matter but to exercise the most intense generosity. I would help both Leagues to unite as one did I not know the obscene fight they hav carried on so vigorously has done more for the genuine, radical, original, National Liberal League than any one event in its history.

I showed my colors at Philadelphia, Rochester, Syracuse, and Cincinnati, just when and where colors were most needed. I am friendly to both Leagues in all that belongs to the original and true objects of such necessary organizations. When the "prodigal son" comes home from his obscene raid, if only an arm or a leg at a time (and he will "and don't you forget it"), then I shall know that in no way hav I attempted to deprive the stray self-conceited boy of his personal liberty, even of the free use of my name or the voluntary proof that I was not then in his estimation counted as one of the obscene offenders. I know of no obscenity supported in either or any Liberal League, therefore I am wholly out of that partisan fight. On that ground I hav never had cause to change my colors or secede from my first love. I do not feel like withdrawing anything I never did. How could I? At present I will leave that work for those who are guilty.

I like you and your letter requesting me to show my colors. I like the good in those persons especially who think it best to leave me while they take my good name with them. Suppose my name does appear in a list with others on their way to an orthodox higher court of hell, it is not my fault, while I hav been and am continually carrying the opposite colors high in the air where every interested observer cannot fail to see them.

If you do not "now" see my colors most distinctly, please put on a pair of material glasses such as I wear, with no obscure speck or selfish mote in them.

You are right. So am I when you understand me. "There's nothing in a name" when put in the wrong place by the wrong person. Our own acts speak loudest for honor or the standard of colors we bear.

Our winning "colors" wave o'er Leagues of Liberal fate.
Numbering one-sixty-nine, not "competent" eight.

A Boy's Composition on Gods.

Gods are the most kurious kritters I hav never seen at all.

They are invisible things what can't be seen verry well, and they ain't good to eat the best way you can fix 'em. Thare haint many round these parts now, but I'v heard Grand Ma tell about 'em, and how thick they used to be when the kuntri was nu. Yo'd see lots of 'em most every day. But they are getting thinned out pretty well now. The only God that ever comes around now in this town is Almity God. He has hit this place about once a week ever since I was a little boy. He has an office in the upper part of the Baptist gospel mill, and he does bizness there whenever he cums. He's always in a hell of a hurry, like a kandidate on elekshun da, has the foks git thare by such a time, and he don't wait a minit if they ain't on time. Jus as soon as the benediction has been shouted he digs rite out, and we won't see nothin' of him for a week.

Elder Kodwolder says this God got into a scrape with a woman once, and the konsequence was a 11 pounder. When he got to be about mi size, he went into the god biziness with his dad, and they and the Holy Ghost, who is a uncle to Jesus by marriage, are running the biziness now in partnership. On week days these gods stay in heaven, a place that's up, a place with gold sidewalks, and roads paved with diamonds, hors-blocks, and hitchin-posts made of solid rubies. The brown-stone fronts are all of solid gold. The horse and cow barns are of black walnut and mahogany, and the cows giv strained milk, and the bees make honey without no comb in it. The streets are so smootbe, that what boys thare are thare (Sabbath-school boys) can play marbles and skate all the year round, and hav frosted cake, berry pie, soda water, ice cream, birch candy, plum puddins, and Thanksgiving dinners three times a day.

Elder Kodwolder says thare is another god called the devil, who livs in another heaven called hell, and thare haint no gold or pearls there at all, and the dimons are spelt with an e instead of an i, and haint so nice as the ones they hav in the other place.

Pa says our folks and Deeken Jones' folks will go to heaven, but Bill Johnson's folks who liv across the way, and who shot our speckled hen for rooting up their kabage, will all go to hell, and all their children.

Elder Kodwolder says hell is a place whare all the people go who don't go to our meeting (I guess thare'll be lots of 'em thare then), and won't pay money to get him snuff and brandy with, and it is a big, long, deep hole with the bottom knocked out, and no end to it. And thare is a great black god with a spike in his tail, and has got lots of little devils to work for him, and they hav thre tined forks, and he bosses them round as father does the hired man. Thare are lots of kettles full of biling hot brimstone, and they pick up a sinner on a fork and slam him into it all over, and if he yells they put patent clothes-pins on his thumbs. Elder said they don't respect nor obey thare, and if my pa should get thare he'd hav to take it like the rest. He says hell is not like a circus; it won't let out at all, but keep showing rite along, day and night, forever, and that will be long enough to suit most anybody.

If Adam went to hell he must be cooked mighty tender by this time. I hope I shant never go to hell. I'll giv the minister all the pennies I can get, and if I can hook any snuff of ma, or brandy of dad, I'll giv it to the minister, and get a receipt for it. It will be nice to show to the door-keeper of heaven.

Pa says gods are awful plenty in China and heathen, wherever that is. They say a good smart fellow could get five hundred gods together in a week, and no two of them alike.

Pa says they hav big white 4 legged gods in India, and when a man comes near it it will pack its trunk and run. They hav god factories in China, whare they make lots of 'em. Elder says basswood makes the best gods of any wood in this kuntry.

In China you can get a vest-pocket god for twenty-five cents, that will last a lifetime. You can set him on a stump or stone and talk to him, face to face as a man talketh with his friend, and he'l do what you tell him, and if he don't you can cuff him to it. I'd trade off my god for such a one, and giv a two-bladed jackknife to boot. I'm glad I wasn't born a god.

The Stealing Church.

Last week we gave the progress that has been made in this state in the matter of church taxation. We now present some facts about the Roman Catholic church, which justify the caption of this article. This is what the church has done in this state and particularly this city alone, but it would undoubtedly do the same in every and any state in which it had the power.

We derive our information from a little pamphlet just published by Dexter A. Hawkins of this city. It is an eloquent argument against the church, and pleads, in unsentimental figures, for the taxation of ecclesiastical property more forcibly than anything we can say. We regret that Mr. Hawkins has not added the Protestant stealings, and recommend him to investigate into that branch of pious thievery as industriously as he has into the Romish.

The gathering of huge properties into the hands, and under the control, of any one corporation or individual is dangerous to the welfare of the people. We see the evil effects in the rapid transit railroads of this city, which hav been enabled to defeat in the legislature a bill for a reduction of rates, when it was shown that the stock had not only been enormously "watered," but that on the whole amount, "water" and all, the road could pay handsome dividends. The railroad is of some practical use, but the church is not. It gathers up and steals enormous amounts simply and solely for its own aggrandizement and glory. It puts its greedy hands into the pockets of the poor and extracts the hard-earned money, which should go for the support of wife and family, to build grand structures and feed fat and indolent priests and furnish "Peter's pence" for a pope who lives in a royal palace with an income hundreds of thousands of times larger than the scanty wages of his dupes. The church constantly uses its influence over the ignorant masses to interfere in the temporal affairs of our country, and by its command of votes is enabled to place in office such men as will make return by voting solid cash from the public treasury. It obtains, by such means, grants of real estate, exemption from taxation, and many favors not otherwise in its power to get. The Protestant sect would undoubtedly be as bad if it had the power, but the cohesion of the Catholic church, making it a vast political and religious machine, enables it to make inroads not only upon our treasury but upon our liberties dangerous to our republican institutions. The police system of Paris in its palmiest and worst days was not more absolutely under the control of one central dictator than the Catholic church. One scheming ambitious man controls the vast machinery, and aided by the confessional obtains information which no police officer can get. And that it uses such information to further its own purposes there can be no doubt. The history of Jesuitism is blotched all over with the treachery of confessing priests. Deceit is a cardinal principle of the Christian religion. The Bible itself says, "The Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets," and Howard Crosby, the Protestant "divine," recommends deceit in this language. "Deceiving them! I tell you gentlemen, I believe in deceit. I believe in deceit wherever you hav got a rightful enemy to destroy." But the Catholic church is pre-eminently the apostle of lying and intrigue. For its own purposes it does not hesitate to commit monstrous crimes. The dagger of the assassin has been its plaything since babyhood. To see it gaining ground in this country may well awaken apprehension in the mind of every friend of progress and lover of his country. Its aim is to keep the people ignorant to the more easily control them. It is the deadly enemy of the public school, and in the countries when it has full sway the people are as nearly allied to the beasts in their mental condition and capacity as is possible for beings to get. Centuries of repression hav left their tell-tale marks. Ignorance and crime go hand in hand down to the grave. Some years ago Mr. Hawkins investigated, under a commission from one of our states, the condition of public education in Rome and the papal states, where the church has absolute control of all its temporal and spiritual affairs. He says:

"The public schools had accommodations for only a small portion of the children of school age. The instruction was of the most meager character, consisting chiefly of the catechism, with very little reading and writing, a smattering of the four simple rules of arithmetic, and little geography beyond that of the papal states—a territory containing 3,000,000 of inhabitants, and only about three times the size of the state of Connecticut. The mass of the people could neither read nor write. A primary school in a log schoolhouse in the back settlements of our country, in its instruction, course of study, and proficiency of its pupils, was far superior to the parochial schools even in the city of Rome. I described to Antonelli the free public schools and the state of public education in Massachusetts, giving that as a model of the American system. His reply was that he 'thought it better that the children should grow up in ignorance, than to be educated in such a system of schools as the state of Massachusetts supported; that the essential part of the education of the people was the catechism; and while arithmetic and geography, reading and writing, and other similar studies, might be useful, they were not essential.' His cousin, in speaking of the state of society in the Holy City, remarked sarcastically, 'its leading and most numerous institutions were a church, a monastery, a nunnery, and a foundling asylum.'"

The war the Catholic church made upon the schools of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and other places, is still fresh in the minds of our readers. One priest threatened with excommunication all parents who should send their children to a public school.

That the church, of both creeds, intends to control the civil power in this country no one can doubt. It already does to some extent. The Catholic church runs this city, and the Protestant church has a paramount influence in Washington. Both are working for their own aggrandizement. Owing to its centralization, the Catholic has the advantage over its sister schemer. The pope is held to be personally infallible, and his orders must be obeyed implicitly. His doctrine is that the people are not the source of civil power; that the church has the right to exercise its authority without any limits set to it by the civil power; and that the church has the right to avail itself of force, and to use the temporal power for that purpose. Such doctrine is in direct and open antagonism to our democratic principles, and the carrying it out would subvert and overthrow the republic founded by our Infidel forefathers.

The church also holds that it has an innate and legitimate right to acquire, hold, and use property without limit. Such was its rapacity that in England, before the statutes of mortmain,

"It had got possession of one-third of the property of the kingdom; and so astute were the priests in evading these statutes that it took four hundred years to perfect them sufficiently to protect the public against this church. Blackstone says that but for those statutes ecclesiastical corporations would soon hav engulfed the whole real estate of England. With all these precautions the civil power had finally to resort to confiscation to restore enough of the lands to the people to insure the prosperity of the realm.

"In Italy, Spain, and Mexico the civil government, for like reasons, though it was Roman Catholic, has been compelled to resort to confiscation.

"In this country, if we should admit that this church has the innate power of acquiring, holding, and using property without limit, we should soon hav to resort to confiscation to save something for the people. History repeats itself.

"In the middle ages this church acquired enormous estates by threatening the sick and the aged with the terrors of the next world if they would not turn over a large part of their property to the church.

"If a person's heirs were not Roman Catholic, he was taught that it was a duty he owed to God to leave his property to the church instead of to heretic heirs. In France, Germany, and England, the most careful and stringent laws hav been enacted to protect estates against the rapacity of this church; but it can, in this country, easily avoid such laws as we hav, by establishing church charities, under the control of the bishop or cardinal, and hav the money left nominally to those charities.

"Such a case occurred in Brooklyn thirty years ago. Cornelius Heeney, an Irishman, came to this city just after the Revolutionary War, was naturalized in 1795, and purchased a farm adjoining the village of Brooklyn in 1806, extending from what is now Court street down to the East River, and lying between what is now Warren street and Pacific street; and being about half a mile in length by three hundred and fifty feet in width. It comprises nine blocks and parts of blocks, nearly two hundred city lots in all. He also afterward became possessed of store and house property in New York.

"He was a bachelor, and in the latter part of his life lived in a cottage on this farm. All his relatives were Protestant; some of them lived with him in this cottage, and others were frequent visitors there for many years. But when ninety years of age, and losing his faculties, the priests managed to surround him with their satellites, to exclude his relatives from his house, and to obtain a will from him giving to institutions of the Roman Catholic church nearly his entire estate. The bulk of this was to go to a society not then incorporated.

"In 1845 they obtained from the Legislature an act of incorporation for this society, under the style of 'The Brooklyn Benevolent Society.' The Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese of New York for the time being is one of the trustees. It was so arranged that practically the society would be entirely under the control of the bishop.

"They then discovered that the will was illegal; and in 1845, a few weeks after getting their society incorporated, they obtained from poor old Mr. Heeney, then enfeebled in mind as well as body, and ninety-two years of age, a codicil devising his entire estate to this Brooklyn Benevolent Society—that is, to the uses of the Romish church. But, fearing that by possibility his relatives might get access to him and learn his condition and discover what had been done, and attack the will, they kept them at a distance for two years; and then, in 1847, protected themselves perfectly against the consequences of another will by having the poor old man declared a lunatic, and one of their own satellites appointed a committee of his person and property."

Such conduct as given in this case is in keeping with the jesuitical practices of the church in all times. The Protestants would do the same. They are as rapacious—if less skilful—as the Romish church, and Mr. Hawkins should bear this in mind a little more strongly than he does.

After all this vast property had been secured by the church, the thing remaining to be done was to get it exempted from taxation. This was done by the passage of an act, one section of which declares that "all property, real and personal, that this society shall hold, shall be and remain free and exempt from all taxation whatsoever." This section exempts property which if taxed would bring the city of Brooklyn $100,000 per year.

How the church controls the elections and puts men in office who will donate generously not only of the public money but from their own stolen funds is thus told:

"Whenever a political party or a corrupt political ring is in a strait for power or existence, its leaders are, if open to business, invited by a dignitary of this church, in the most polite and insinuating manner, to subscribe generously for some object of the church. Such an invitation, given to the managers of the Tweed ring, when it was in extremis, brought nearly $200,000 for the completion of the Cathedral; and, to the astonishment of good citizens, Tweed, after exposure, secured votes enough in his district to be re-elected to the state Senate by the largest majority ever given in this city for one senator. In those days the Irish Roman Catholic vote was in doubt until after mass on the Sunday before election. Then word would pass that 'so and so is the man.' Personal papal infallibility filtered down through the priests to the voters is a secret and invincible force—provided the voters are educated to that degree of superstition and ignorance attainable only in their parochial schools.

"The city contractors under Tweed obtained double prices from the public treasury for their work; but many of them before they secured a contract were invited to subscribe large sums for Roman Catholic institutions, and did so. These, with the amounts paid to the ring direct, left not a very large profit to the contractor. In those days the Romish institutions in this city multiplied and waxed strong."

It has been said by the most brilliant of living orators that the "church has reduced Spain to a guitar, Italy to a hand-organ, and Ireland to exile." The truth of the statement is made apparent when we read that in five years the Commissioners of Charities and Correction in this city cared for 98,787 Catholic paupers, to say nothing of the large number helped by the institutions on stolen money, and that the police of the city arrested in fifteen years 571,497 Roman Catholics. On this basis (the number of Americans is also given), there is no room for doubting Mr. Hawkins's statement that "a child trained up in the Roman Catholic parochial school is so much inferior intellectually to one trained up in the public school that he is three and a half times as likely to become a pauper as he would be if he attended the free public schools of the city. . . . And that a child trained in the parochial school of the Roman Catholic church is more than three and a quarter times as likely to get into jail as the child trained in the free public school."

Some of the doctrines, as given in an encyclical by the late Pius IX, are interesting reading to Americans. Pius—and he spoke ex cathedra—lays it down that the pope and the priests ought to hav dominion over temporal affairs; that the church and her ecclesiastics hav a right to immunity from civil laws; that the clergy should be tried for civil and criminal offenses only in ecclesiastical courts; that in case of conflict between the ecclesiastical and civil powers, the ecclesiastical powers ought to prevail; that the church has the right to interfere in the discipline of the public schools and in the arrangement of the studies and in the choice of teachers; and it holds that all schools should be under the church's supervision and independent of the civil power; and that while teaching primarily the knowledge of natural things, the public schools must not be separated from the faith and power of the church; and the most dangerous doctrine is the one held in common with too many Protestants that the church and state should be united. On this latter question Mr. Hawkins sees clear to the bottom of the subject. He says:

"We must expect the Romish church to wage perpetual war upon our public schools, and to make persistent attacks upon the public treasury, and to persevere in their attempts to control the civil power, until we thoroughly convince it that the public schools and the right of the children to attend them are to be perfectly protected; and that neither it nor any other church can be allowed to get a dollar out of the public treasury; and that the civil power in all temporal affairs is, at all hazards, to be kept above and superior to any and all ecclesiastical powers. Not a cent can be paid from the public treasury to any sectarian institution without acknowledging the principle of a state church and the right to tax the people at large to sustain that church. Such a course admits the thin end of a wedge that, if driven home, will destroy the principle of toleration and of absolute separation of church and state.

"In this regard our politicians in this city and in this state hav erred greatly—grievously, the fleeced tax-payers would say. They hav for years bid high, and are now bidding high, for the votes controlled by this church; and hav paid, and are now paying, their bids, not with their own money, but with the property and money of the tax-payers."

The chicanery by which the Catholic church obtained the immensely valuable property upon which the Fifth avenue Cathedral is located, is thus explained by Mr. Hawkins:

"The church got possession of a lease from the city at a nominal annual rent; when forfeited for non-payment of this rent, the city waived the forfeitures, and, on payment by the church of $83.32, converted the lease into a fee. This lot, eight hundred feet long, running from Fifth to Fourth avenues, had no frontage on Fiftieth street, but was cut off from that street by a strip ten inches wide on Fifth avenue, and five feet six inches wide on Fourth avenue. The city made an even exchange with the church of this freehold strip for a much smaller leasehold strip on the block above. This gave the church the whole block, now, by the extension of Madison avenue through it, two blocks; and then the city paid the church $24,000 for said extension of the avenue, and also gave it $8,928.84 to pay an assessment, thus making substantially a donation of these two blocks, worth now, without buildings, at least $1,500,000, and a gift in money of $32,928.84.

"The city also gave the church the block above this, from Fifth to Fourth avenues, now two blocks, by two leases for ninety-nine years at $1 a year rent each. These two blocks, without buildings, are worth now at least another $1,500,000.

"The city, for $1 a year, gave to the archbishop for the Sisters of Mercy, half a block of land on Madison avenue between Eighty-first and Eighty-second streets. This, without buildings, is worth now at least $200,000.

"The city, for $1 a year, gave for the Sisters of Charity a whole block of land on Lexington avenue between Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth streets. This, without buildings, is worth now at least $300,000.

"Total, five and a half blocks of land in the best part of the city, worth $3,500,000."

Besides this huge amount of $3,500,000 worth of real estate, Mr. Hawkins finds, from the public records, that this city has donated to different Catholic churches and institutions $6,043,626.45 in eleven years, an average annual donation of $549,420.59. Even this is not all, for the statement of some of the societies for "certain years is not yet fully examined, and all the guises under which this church preys upon the public treasury are not yet ferreted out."

There is a little nigger in the fence in Mr. Hawkin's statement that "some of the Protestant religious denominations receive a small donation from the public treasury in this city for their charities, but they are opposed to the whole business, as recognizing the principle of a union of church and state, and would be glad to hav each tub stand on its own bottom; that is, each church support its charities with its own money, and not with the money of others, but the Roman Catholics oppose it." Mr. Hawkins declares that he is not in favor of any denomination deriving support from the public treasury, but though he advocates the taxing of the Roman church, he is silent about forcing the Protestants to disgorge. But the fact that he originally prepared his paper for a bigoted sectarian organ may account for it. But it is curious that he condones the giving of small donations to the Protestants and condemns giving the large ones to the Catholic church. It would look as though he were afraid to logically follow down to bedrock the conclusions drawn from the premises he so ably presents.

The only logical and equitable method is to absolutely shut down on all donations and exemptions from taxation. Let every rod of land and foot of buildings not owned by the state be taxed. Let the state take care of its own criminals, paupers, and mendicants. If churches wish to sustain institutions for the conversion of paupers and wrong-doing children into Catholic or Protestant Christians, let them pay taxes on them the same as other manufacturers do. A union of church and state under even the disguise of charity should be vigorously fought. The statement that Protestants are opposed to such a union is not in accordance with facts. But last fall a convention was held to push it along, and all know of the attempt which so nearly succeeded of the God-in-the-Constitution party in the Senate. Protestants, too, are as ready, and even anxious, to get money from the public crib as the most avaricious Catholic priest. The Young Men's Christian Association is as near an approach to a society of Jesuits as we care to see in this country. The utterance of Howard Crosby would pass for a sentence from the Jesuit Manual, and Comstock was never excelled as a sneak by any spy in the employ of Loyola.

How the church succeeded in getting this chance to steal is thus told:

In this city [New York] this church was subsidized by the Tweed ring, and nearly $800,000 paid to it in a single year, 1869. In 1870 petitions from more than one hundred thousand citizens caused the Legislature to repeal the law, the repeal to take effect near the end of that year, imposing a perpetual tax of nearly $250,000 on this city for their parochial schools. On Washington's Birthday, 1872, a detailed exposure of this "Tweed ring" subsidy for the three preceding years to the extent of $1,396,389.51 was made, and the subsidy in consequence fell that year to $421,674 03. In the autumn of 1872 the "Tweed ring" were driven from power in both the city and state. Constitutional amendments were prepared in 1873, and finally adopted in 1874, which, had they not been interfered with, and two pestilent clauses jesuitically introduced into the amendments to Article VIII by the skill and influence of a Catholic member of the Constitutional Commission, would hav cut those subsidies up by the roots.

"These two legal wolves in sheep's clothing were the apparently harmless phrase, 'and juvenile delinquents' in section 10, and the sentence, 'This section shall not prevent such county, city, town, or village from making such provision for the aid or support of its poor as may be authorized by law,' in section 11.

"Under the 'juvenile delinquents,' this church saved chapter 647, Laws of 1866, giving the Roman Catholic Protectory annually out of the city treasury $50 per head; and chapter 428, Laws of 1867 giving it annually $60 more per head (total, $110 per head, or double the actual cost) of its inmates, thus securing a subsidy of from two to three hundred thousand dollars per year from the tax-payers, and, if well managed, a clear profit to the church of at least $100,000. So profitable to this sect is this Protectory that they keep sentinels on the watch at each police court to induce commitments to the Protectory, and hav had laws enacted compelling justices to commit to it. They made war on a public school connected with the city almshouse, and, by act of Legislature, broke it up for the purpose of getting possession of a portion of the inmates to swell their own numbers and profits.

"Immediately after the above amendment to section 11 of the Constitution was adopted, this church made haste to set its skilled talent to devise schemes to connect whole broods of their institutions by a sort of sectarian suction-hose with the public treasury. It accomplished this under the word 'poor' in the above sentence in section 11. It had the word 'poor' defined by chapter 221, Laws of 1875, so as to include, among others, 'the sick, destitute, friendless, and infirm,' and the occupants of their enormous boarding-house, built on land given by the city, and improperly called the 'Foundling Asylum of the Sisters of Charity;' and by the same statute they grabbed the excise moneys, thus adding several hundred thousand dollars more to their annual subsidy.

"These so-called 'foundlings' may be two years old when received by the Sisters, and may board with them, or under their control, till eighteen years old if girls and twenty-one years old if boys. They may be indentured to this institution, if half-orphans, by either the father or mother; and the mother may board there, also, to look after the children. For every child boarding there these 'charitable Sisters' draw from the city treasury $138.70 per year, and for every mother boarding there, $216 per year; total for a mother and child, $354.70 per year, besides having the work of the children and mothers.

"Most of the hard-working laborers throughout the country would be glad to turn 'poor' and support themselves if they could draw from the city treasury at this rate. These advantages to this sect are secured by chapter 635, Laws of 1872, chapter 644, Laws of 1874, and chapter 43, Laws of 1877. The cost to the city treasury of this church boarding-house of the Sisters of Charity is now between two and three hundred thousand dollars per year, and if well managed brings annually not less than $100,000 net profit to the church.

"By concentrating their forces, and by a change of name or of statement as to what they are doing, so as on paper to appear to be 'aiding or supporting the poor,' nearly all their organizations hav got back into the public treasury again, and the annual subsidy to this church is now as great as in the palmy days of the Tweed ring. In the last two years in this city it drew from the public money $1,403,967.27!

"They may call any persons in their schools and institutions 'the poor,' and so pension them upon the public treasury. There is no investigation of their statements or accounts, or supervision of their institutions by any public officer, as common safety requires where the public money is paid out to them; but whatever statement under oath they choose to make is accepted as the basis of payment to them.

"An amount of public money equal to two and one-half per cent of the entire tax levy, or six per cent of the administrative expenses of the entire city government, is thus paid annually to this church in this city.

"Any tax-payer can from his tax bills readily calculate how much of this is exacted from him; and this, too, in a country where a state church is prohibited by the Constitution, and in a state where the organic law forbids "discrimination or favor" to any church

"An examination of the roll of taxpayers in this city shows that those belonging to the Roman Catholic church pay about one-tenth part of the public taxes; while they draw from the public treasury for the societies belonging to their churches nearly ten times as much as those of all the other religious sects together.

"The fact that Roman Catholics excel all other sects in the number of their paupers and criminals in this city is no reason for thus pensioning this denomination upon the public treasury; but, on the contrary, is a reason against doing it; for the interests of the tax-payers, and of society, and of civilization all require that public support should not be given to a sect that has made such a signal failure in reducing pauperism and crime among its adherents."

In the next to the last paragraph we again see the animus of Mr. Hawkins. The Roman church gets ten times as much as the Protestant; that is, the Catholic church has, during the last eleven years, stolen $6,043,626.45, while the Protestant church has been able to make away with only $604,362.64 1-2. But Mr. Hawkins should bear in mind that the Liberals of the city are compelled to help support both these churches, much against their will. The principle which gives the church one dollar can and does giv it millions. Therefore the remedy is not in special legislation against the Catholics, but in laws that force every worshiper to pay for his own god. The one thing lacking in this otherwise admirable pamphlet is an explanation why the Protestants, who object decidedly to the Catholic steals, should themselves dip into the treasury to the extent of over half a million dollars in one city, besides having many million dollars' worth of real estate exempt from the visits of the tax-gatherer. We presume they pursue the same methods as their mother church, and to us it seems that what is reprehensible in the old lady is not less worthy of condemnation in the daughter.

How to Receive Mr. Bennett.

The Church, Judge Benedict, and Comstock hav had their little revenge on the Liberals of this country. They accepted the risks and took their pound of flesh, regardless of the blood. In as much as they did it to one of the most honest, most modest, and unassuming editors in all this country, they did it to all the Liberals in the United States. We hav all been imprisoned during the past year in the person of Mr. Bennett and our day of deliverance is approaching as well as his. Every patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, every sympathizer with Mr. Bennett, every skeptic, unbeliever, or anti-christian, has been in jail in his person. Our free thought was constructively shut up, while he did the vicarious atonement with his physical body. Now our turn and his are coming to exhibit our power. What shall we do to make it manifest in all its strength?

Mr. Bennett, in his physical body, may hav been weakened by his term of imprisonment, but his mind, the instrument with which he does such deadly execution against his persecutors, has been strengthened, and the free thought in the brains of all of us who hav staid outside has been immeasurably reinforced. In the conduct of this fight we are many brigades stronger than last year when we were made prisoners of war. Now when we all get out of jail will be a good time to turn out for a review of our forces.

The question is, How shall we receive Mr. Bennett, how will he receive us, and what shall be the shape of the defiance we throw down to the Christian world on his reappearance?

Many plans and suggestions hav been offered through THE TRUTH SEEKER. Quite a number of persons hav proposed to meet Mr. Bennett at Albany, charter a steamer, and escort him in grand excursion down the river to New York. Others hav proposed to send simply a committee to Albany to accompany him to New York, then receive him here with a turnout of carriages, banners, music, and a procession. Others suggest only a large indignation meeting in some great hall, with appropriate speeches. Others propose a dinner at Delmonico's. A few undemonstrative people say the best way to receive Mr. Bennett is to increase his subscription list, build up his paper, and make him strong and invulnerable just where the Christians hav hoped and intended to make him weak. This last plan would probably be the best of all—most distressing to the Christians and also the most pleasing to the retiring nature of Mr. Bennett—if Liberals universally would take hold and do it. A present of 10,000 new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, on the first of May next, would be a magnificently grand way of receiving him. But the inherently best ways are almost always impracticable. The perfect must always be approximated and never reached. It is the nature of most men to delight in demonstration, pageantry, vociferation, and show. They will sooner giv ten or twenty dollars to promote a great occasion, wherein there is something to be done and seen and exhibited—especially wherein they themselves are to take part—than they would giv a dollar to quietly, and without noise, develop a formidable and efficient power. Accordingly the prevailing sentiment takes a demonstrative shape. So much is settled. But what shall the style of it be? The steamer and excursion proposition is thought by the Committee of Management to be too expensive—also too uncertain. Not enough of the friends of Mr. Bennett would assemble at Albany to make it a success. There ought to be from 500 to 1,000, to present an imposing array, and to make it pay. There are uncertainties as to weather also. A storm might spoil it all after great expense had been incurred. The street procession, sashes, flags, banners, barouche and six, and brass band, are thought not quite fitting for the occasion. This, too, would not suit the undemonstrative taste of Mr. Bennett. We come, then, to the public meeting and the public dinner. These are quiet, unexceptionable, in good taste, and can be made sufficiently imposing. These two means of receiving Mr. Bennett are most in favor with the Committee, and one or the other, or possibly both, may be adopted. It will depend on the contributions and the numbers who will come forward to join in the movement.

The city of New York is not rich in active Liberals—neither rich in numbers nor in means. There are great numbers of negative Liberals who are simply indifferent to the prevailing religions, but few who will join organizations, enlist for the war, or help spread the light. We must look greatly to other cities and to the country for aid in this demonstration in favor of Mr. Bennett. We, here in New York, need to know how many we can count on from other parts of the country and how much we can obtain in subscriptions, how many persons will come to New York on purpose; how many merchants and others who are coming this spring on business will so time their visit as to be present on this occasion; how many will prefor a public meeting say in Cooper Institute, and how many will attend a public dinner at say $2.00 a ticket? Over two hundred thousand Liberals signed the petition for Mr. Bennett's release; how many of them will come to New York, take part in the movement, and share in the expense of giving him an appropriate reception? Some of the local Leagues may like to send delegations and contributions. They are hereby invited to do so and will be most welcome. If two or three hundred such delegates and private pilgrims will come to this city, we will make up the rest and the demonstration will be a success.

Liberals of the United States, the time has been when "all roads led to Rome." It is so no longer. Many of the old roads, even those to Geneva and Edinburgh, cities of Calvinism and illiberalism, are badly washed, guttered, bridges unplanked, rotted, and broken, and all the highways become so dangerous that they are practically abandoned. Only here and there a solitary horseman of the Knox and Calvin type can now be seen wending his lonely way over the grass-grown road by the fading light of the setting sun of righteousness, which once blazed so fiercely with healing in its wings. Now new roads hav been opened that lead to Paris, Berlin, London, and New York, cities of Liberalism and science. Mr. Bennett, in the quiet of retiracy the past year, and in the intervals of making shoes in the United States prison, has also been building one of these roads for Liberal seven-league boots to travel upon. It will be opened for travel when he and we come out of prison. Let us celebrate its opening in a style that is worthy of a broad-guage enterprise, so that many may go in thereat.

Mr. Bennett has been for a year in possession of the Philistines to enable them to work their own sweet will upon him. Let us come together to see what they hav done to him. Let us meet to examine his condition and assess the damages, then proceed to collect by reprisals. We must giv a receipt for him when he is delivered over to us. Let it be a receipt right between the eyes of the Comstock party, stamped so indelibly that we can forever point to it as in full of all demands up to date. Let us be good haters of injustice and seek revenge for injuries received. As they hav stolen our white robes of purity, let's tear away their cloak of hypocrisy also. Let us turn what cheek they hav left and smite it. Since their eye, dwelling so long on obscenity, has become offensive, let us pluck it out and cast it before the swine that they are. In short, whatsoever things they would that we should do unto them, that don't do; and whatsoever things they would not, these are the things that we would. This is Benedict law and Comstock profits. Let us, according to that law, forgive them their trespasses as they hav trespassed against us. As they led us from temptation, let us deliver them into evil, for our own glory, for ever and ever. Amen. T. C. LELAND.

NEXT week the Reception Committee will hav perfected their arrangements, and be enabled to fix definitely the place and manner of jubilation.

"God is Sovereign of the Universe."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker. Sir: The above heading was the first sentence in a discourse read by an orthodox Christian Baptist minister in Tully, N. Y., to his hearers on a Sunday morning not long since; and while listening to his godly discourse, some thoughts were suggested to me which, with your permission, I place before the readers of The Truth Seeker, hoping to gain light from some source on this subject.

My first thought was, if God was sovereign of the universe he must be sovereign over our little world, and why does he not manage its affairs so as to please the most intelligent creatures found on it, men and women, and make them all healthy, intelligent, and happy, instead of suffering so many to become sickly, ignorant, unhappy, and miserable? Why does he not fill the world with love instead of hatred? Why does he not create pleasure instead of pain? If he is sovereign, could he not easily do this? and would not the world be better for it? Why does he not right up the wrongs of this earth that so badly need righting? Why does he not cause virtue to be more desired and practiced than vice? and why does he not eradicate vice altogether?

If God is sovereign and possessed with almighty power, infinite wisdom, and boundless love for all his creatures, why does he permit a few to monopolize the wealth of this world and liv in idleness and luxury upon the earnings of the toiling millions who suffer in want and poverty?

If God is just, why does he suffer priests to delude men about the demands of God, and of his wrath that will be dealt out in fury to all unbelievers in absurdities, in eternal doses?

Why will he suffer the learned to defraud the ignorant, and rob them of their just dues?

If God is sovereign of this world, why does he allow so many innocent children to die, and thus wring the hearts of parents with agony at their departure? and why suffer so many people to be destroyed by shipwreck, tornadoes, earthquakes, accident, and fire, when it would seem so much easier to save them than to build a world, and thus prevented much anguish and suffering?

Why did God create a devil to oppose him in his good designs toward mankind in this world, and to torture them eternally in the next?

As God punishes not the most guilty here when committing crime, what reason hav we to think he will punish in some future life?

A belief in such doctrines involves us in three false assumptions. First, that a personal God exists; second, there is a future existence for us; third, that God will deal out justice to all in the next life and punish for crimes committed here.

A pretended belief in such teachings establishes nothing, as true belief is founded only on positive evidence; and as the existence of a personal God cannot be demonstrated, the three assumptions are false and foolish.

Had a God ever been seen or known to take a part even in the management of the affairs of this world, or to punish, correct, reform, or chastise the basest criminals and the most heartless scoundrels in society, there might then be some proof of his existence; and if unchangeable, that the same policy would be carried out in a future life should there be any. But remember a future existence for man is not established, could the existence of God be proved, as the existence of the finite is not assured by the existence of the infinite.

How, or when, this world came into existence we do not know; but we do not propose to create an imaginary God to account for and still more perplex us in solving the mystery. So far as we know man is now the highest sovereign in this world, and upon whom is devolving all the responsibility of human suffering and happiness, human ignorance and intelligence, and everything at all concerning the management of affairs with which mankind has to do, and no God that we know of dictates or assists him in the least in the discharge of these duties.

Although admitting he was unseen, the preacher through his discourse assured us of the existence of this personal God, and of his rightful sovereignty over this world and over all mankind, and if this be true he must be directly responsible for all the ills and suffering of mankind, and for all injustice, cruelty, and wrong that Christians so often pray him to remove from them, and to whose prayers he has never given the slightest attention.

This would be discouraging to any but ignorant, superstitious God-worshipers, blinded and duped by the designing priesthood.

But the small congregation, of considerably less than a hundred, appeared pleased, and were, no doubt, well satisfied with the able effort to bring all to acknowledge the sovereignty of this wonderful, unseen, indescribable, unaccountable, mythical, imaginary something, somewhere in the clouds, to which all mankind were accountable.

How a single intelligent person could be benefited by such a discourse I failed to see; but they were remarkably attentive, and perhaps highly entertained by the learned and cultured preacher, though no truthful, useful knowledge was taught or acquired.

Had the preacher defined and located his God, proved his existence and jurisdiction over this world, showing his rightful authority over mankind, or brought one instance to show that he personally superintended this world's affairs, it would hav been worthy of his efforts, of an hour spent in encouraging faith in mysteries by fallacious reasonings. Such a discourse was no doubt highly edifying to the god-believer in miracles and mystics, and strengthened him in the delusion, but tended to strengthen unbelief in the intelligent reasoning person desiring real instruction.

I continued to think of the unproved assumptions—God exists, is a personal being, a sovereign over this world, all of which remain unproved.

If he is a person, where could he locate him outside of this world, or in it, unless in mankind? If he is sovereign he must act out his own pleasure, and why should I desire to advise, instruct, or attempt to control him in the least matter?

If God is infinite, why should the finite, with his speck of knowledge, assume to dictate or change the mind of the infinite, as Christians are continually doing?

We hav no evidence that his God is sovereign of these United States of America, not being known in the Constitution nor in framing, supporting, expounding, or in executing the laws; counseling, improving, or finding fault with them; thus, we logically conclude he is not sovereign of this government and its laws, or over the American people.

The preacher affirmed that Jesus Christ was the ruler over the nations of the earth, but no evidence was adduced to prove the assertion; and to me it appeared no more truthful than the God sovereignty, as we hav proof positive that Jesus Christ does not rule over this American nation at least.

Thus we are forced to conclude if his God has an existence, it must be in some other world beyond our knowledge and for purposes to us unknown; neither can they be known, therefore do not particularly concern us inhabitants of this planet.

If God really exists as a person, however powerful, wise, benevolent, just, truthful, honest, or good he may be, he must hav a location; however much he may desire to attend to the wants of all the millions of humanity at the same time it must be an impossibility, as the person of a God even cannot exist in all places, on all planets and worlds at the same time; and if sovereign of this world, could be of no practical use, perhaps would be more useful in other worlds than here, and had better giv them his attention, as this runs very well without any visible assistance from him.

Were men taught to depend less on the aid of a visionary God and more upon their own reason and honest endeavor, many things might be managed much better than they now are.

Thus, having no positive knowledge that God ever existed in this world, and no person being able to describe him, and everything in nature moving in continuous perfect order without him, we find no use for him if he were here.

Were a pretended God to take the form of an animal or of man and come among us assuming the right to counsel or advise us, we would giv little attention to his teachings unless good, reasonable, and superior to those we already hav. But should he presume to dictate to us, command us under severe penalties and threats to obey him, we would refuse to submit to such tyranny, and question his authority as sovereign over us, and claim the right of self-government, asking such an intruder to withdraw his insolent demands; and if he did not giv proper heed he would be expelled by force from our midst as a tyrant and despot.

Were Jesus Christ to come on earth again and claim the right Christians claim for him, to rule this nation, or to make or enforce a single law, if not in harmony with our laws, he would quickly be asked to retire, as these places are all filled by men supposed to be competent to execute them with propriety without his aid. But when a visionary, mythical God, existing nowhere, except in the imagination of superstitious, fanatical god-worshipers, is presented to us as having a real existence and claims on us superior to the demands of our country and of dearest friends, is it not time for us to examine this matter.

The marvelous, the supernatural, the unaccountable, and the untruthful hav too long been taught us, and it is full time that reason, the divine in man, should hav its say, and grow men and women worthy of the time, free from the slavery of mind religiously, as the bodies of men are now free from what was a few years since denominated American slavery.

The arrogant assumer of the existence of a God as sovereign over any people—except the Jewish Jehovah over the ancient Jews, and he was plenty good enough for them—should be compelled to prove the existence of, describe and locate his God satisfactorily to his people; then they should be permitted to accept him as their sovereign—if in accord with the laws of the land—or reject him, as they saw fit.

This world we know exists, and has its uses; man also exists and has his uses; now, could a God be as plainly shown to exist in this world or in any other—either would do if demonstrated—certainly no one could deny it, and perhaps none object to it.

But people will doubt honestly, and hav a right to, till a God can be as plainly seen somewhere, existing in something or some form, as does this earth and human beings. And until that time shall come man must exist as God manifest in human form and as the most intelligent being known in the universe, making all laws to govern mankind and to control their actions; and further, to make all the gods and devils, heavens and hells, known, and those in this life, as science has not yet demonstrated a future life after the death in this body. So, Mr. Editor, it is useless to attempt to stretch the faith of intelligent, reasoning people to a belief of a personal God having spoken this world into existence out of nothing, and who still has charge of it and keeps it in running order, as is still taught from thousands of pulpits in the land. Priests will hav to stop asserting so much without proof, and when they tell us the existence of this world cannot be accounted for without first creating a God, we tell them it cannot be accounted for then, as it perplexes us the more in the investigation. It is much more rational to say the universe has eternally existed, and will continue to exist eternally in some form, than to create an imaginary God who six thousand years ago labored for six days, has done nothing since, and we know not that he ever will. It would be impossible to tell how he sprang into existence, show the necessity for his existence, how he made the world, or what there is now for him to do. Yours,

Tully, N. Y., March, 1880. R. C. Trowbridge.

Religious Teaching vs. Moral and Scientific Education.

'Tis education forms the infant mind;
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: This truth the most stupid priests understand thoroughly and never fail to act upon. They carefully bend the twig while it is yet young; they carefully hang about the cradle of infancy, and there commence the work of intellect-stultification. Instead of aiding to unfold and strengthen the faculties of those committed to their care, they take stringent measures to hinder their development, What they teach us while young it would be well for us could we forget when old. Instead of cultivating in their pupils sentiments of independence, generosity, and noble affections, they studiously make them servile, intensely selfish, and alarmed at less than shadows. Instead of urging them on in the pursuit of knowledge, they are incessantly engaged in attempts to frighten them into Christian understanding of the most ridiculous beliefs.

Hume has justly remarked that "virtue is nothing but enlarged and cultivated reason, and never flourished to any degree except where a good education becomes general and where men are taught the pernicious consequences of vice, treachery, and immorality." Yes, I am aware that mystery-mongers (priests, of course, I mean) do not take one-thousandeth part the pains to make those they miseducate understand the pernicious consequences of vice, treachery, and immorality that they do the pernicious consequences of disbelief in certain monstrous dogmas of theology that no child either can or ought to believe. Is it not a fact that in all dissenting churches and schools children are taught as divine truth that non-belief in a man-god—who, after being born of a virgin, was nailed upon a cross, dead, buried—and other follies and doctrines quite in keeping with this, is a crime of the deepest dye, only to be expiated by eternity of torment? If the children educated in those schools hav intellectual hardihood enough to demand proof of such monstrous doctrines being true, are they not silenced by rods, scare-crows, hell-and-damnation proof? The books thrust into their hands are not treatises on science, art, physiology, astronomy, anatomy, medicine, etc., but others of a very different genus, such as the Bible, or Jew-book, and J. M. Watson's "Third Reader." These are the kind of books placed in the hands of children by spiritual charlatans and God-struck lunatics. These are the precious instruments through which the church, as well as our schools, is teaching children to become hypocrites, liars thieves, murderers, and also jail-birds.

As to creating "an enlarged and cultivated reason," nothing can be further from their intentions. No, their object is not to enlarge but to destroy reason; and so far from ever having shown a disposition to cultivate reason, they hav uniformly opposed every attempt to improve it. To make the feelings sneeze with devotion and teach the children solemn nonsense about a bloodthirsty God, spiritual mustard-pots, or an everlasting hell, faithful Christians booted and spurred for paradise, priests of divine religion hav ever been ready; but never, in the whole course of their horrid history, hav they shown themselves any other than haters of real knowledge and foes of popular liberty. The following lines are appropriate to my present purpose:

By false training most all hav been misled,
So they believe because they hav been so bred.
The priest continues what the nurse began,
And thus the child imposes on the man.

Therefore, Mr. Editor, I do heartily detest the doings of all priests of whatever name and clime. I am compelled to view them as "salaried opponents of truth and knowledge." Yes, it is with their atrocious principles, and no less atrocious practices, that I war so fiercely. Experience has proved them the least fit of all men to educate the rising generation. They cannot, as priests, touch anything in their capacity without defiling it; and until the people shake them off as dew is shaken from the horse's mane, popular liberty, based on sound educational principles, is a sham and a dream.

Those who wish or hope to reconcile religion, whether true or false, with morality, are wild fanatics or superstitionists of the worst dye. Such know not human nature, and certainly never can materially benefit it. In the soil of pure reason all the virtues would infallibly take root and flourish; but Christians, like all other priests, detest reason and deem it their most sacred duty to crush it in the bud. Shall we, then, hesitate to snatch from their hands that power they hav wielded so prejudicial to the highest interests of humanity? The best proposition is to educate the whole people in harmony with the most approved moral principles, and, totally irrespective of religionism and God-ism, would surely and speedily effect this most desirable of all desideratums.

It is time the people practiced virtue without fearing either God or devil, and continue to enjoy the fullest measure of freedom without being any longer cheated by priests and their aristocratic allies. It is the priestly catechism that upholds priestly influence. Once let the advocates of reason and liberty be armed with the same authority to teach the youthful population of this country that Christian priests hav hitherto enjoyed, and religion and gods will receive their mortal death-wound. The real governors of the people are those who educate them. Christian priests and Christian teachers hav given to the people of this country most all the instruction they hav hitherto received. No marvel, therefore, that rotten Christianity has become the manners, customs, and laws of the land. What is part and parcel of popular customs must decide the morality or immorality of a nation. Now I hold that the sooner the priests and religious people cease to meddle with educational matters the better. In ages of barbarism their hellish doctrines were comparatively innoxious. But now that knowledge is making its way through the ramifications of society, it ought not to be tolerated that Christians or priests of any denomination should be enormously paid to obstruct the cause of civilization or pollute the understandings of the rising generation under the pretense of Christianizing the people; and in conclusion I will add,

Let the work of truth fairly prevail
Throughout this unhappy land;
And Christian dogmas they will die
When reason takes the stand.

Then reason's lessons will be taught
Unto the sons of men:
Then minds with wisdom will be fraught;
Yes, then, and not till then.

I am, with all due respect,
The well-wisher of the human race,

The Beauties of the Bible.

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i, 1).

By citing and analyzing passages of scripture we may be able to comprehend in slight degree the transcendent beauties of the Bible.

Those beauties, like the poles of a magnet, may be either positive or negative.

A moment's reflection will convince any honest inquirer after truth, any candid, intelligent mind, that God did not create the heavens and the earth in the beginning; for whenever that was, he only began to create, unless, as elsewhere stated, "He spake and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. xxxiii, 9), which we now hav positive evidence is not the way in which God creates or created the universe. But this will be shown more obviously as we proceed.

"And the earth was without form, and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (Gen. i, 2).

We notice, first, the earth was without form, and void—an impossibility, as figure, or form, is a property of matter; and consequently, however irregular it may hav been, the earth must hav had some form. But it is said it was without form, and void. Two mistakes, sad blunders of Moses, whoever asserted it.

Moses was a great magician. Can it be he was also a pantheist? He asserts that God created the earth without form. He also says that when the Jews saw God they "saw no manner of similitude" (Deut. iv, 15). Admitted, and who can disprove identity?

"The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Psychologists, please make a note here—a spirit has a spirit. This was a dark spirit, for darkness was upon the great deep. The ancient Jews held that the "Shekanah," a light more brilliant than the sun, denoted the visible presence of God; or, "the light of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire" (Ex. xxiv, 17.) Paul, at conversion, was struck blind by a light, and says: "God is light, and in him is no darkness." "The city [New Jerusalem] had no need of the sun, for the glory of God did light it," etc. The God of the Jews changed often, consequently could not hav been the true God, who changes not. John of Patmos says God has "seven spirits" (Rev. iii, 1; iv, 5; v, 6).

The Hebrew word ruach and the Greek pneuma, here translated spirit, are variously rendered ghost, soul, body, spirit, wind, air, breath. And hence if the reading were, The breath of God, or, The wind rippled the face of the waters, what candid Greek or Hebrew Bible student would assert that though less grandiloquent it would not be as correct and truthful a translation?

"And God said, Let there be light, and there was light, and God called the light day, and the darkness he called night "And the evening and the morning were the first day" (Gen. i, 3, 5).

The sun was not made until the fourth day, and the beauty of all this consists in there having been three days without a sun!

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters above it, and it was so" (Gen. i, 6, 7).

From this any unsophisticated mind of ordinary intelligence would be led to conclude that Moses supposed space to a very great extent was occupied by a vast body of water, and consequently a solid expansion or dividing sheet was indispensable to shut off or exclude the superabundant waters, so that the earth or dry land might become inhabitable, or at least make its appearance. (Gen. i, 9.) And hence it is obvious that this firmament or expansion to answer its intended purposes must hav been impervious to water, strong and solid. Dr. Gibson assures us that the word firmament is not only not in the Hebrew Bible, but it is "an unfortunate translation of the original word." If, as orthodox polemics tell us, the Bible is full of mistranslations, then why palm it off as the "word of God," or as of any authority? If there is any mistranslation in this instance it is in not making the English word strong enough to fully express the meaning of the original.

And yet Dr. Gibson says, "The Hebrew word raquia admirably expresses the tenuity of our atmosphere; just the best word that could be chosen to signify the atmosphere," I take direct issue with him on this point. The word used is rakiah, and is derived from the Hebrew verb raka or raqua, which signifies to spread metal with the hammer, to make it flat, to crush to pieces, to beat, etc. Moses uses the word to describe the gold which was beaten in order to cover the ark and the tables of the holy with it. (Ex. xxxix, 3; Num. xvi, 38, 39.) And Isaiah to denote the plates of gold wherewith the idols were covered (Isa. xl, 19), and the same prophet and the psalmist to express the spreading forth of the earth, and its floating upon the waters, for this was the conception the Hebrews had of it (Isa. xlii, 5; Ps. cxxxvi, 6). And it should always be borne in mind that this rakiah, however expanded or spread out, or thin, or of whatever material composed, was to be adequate to its intended use, viz., "to divide the waters above from those below it." Could the atmosphere do this? The mistake, then, is not in the mistranslation of the word, but in the egregious blunder of supposing that a vast body of water surrounded the earth and filled the heavens, requiring a solid sheet, strong and substantial, to keep it from deluging the whole earth. Here then, we hav two more of those negative beauties to be nailed, like bogus coins, to truth's center, the one inspirational, the other inspirational, the one the blunder of a witness who wished to testify better than he knew, the other of one who knew better than he wished to testify, and consequently did not tell truth enough to screen him from the charge of being a partial, perhaps a false, witness.

"And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night: and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven, to giv light upon the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven, to giv light upon the earth" (Gen. i, 14–17). Here we note a decided improvement. The cosmogonist Moses (or whoever the author) worked his architect three whole days and nights by the light of his flat lamp, and now wisely sets him to making permanent lamps which he sets in the solid expansion or rakiah, as jewels are set in a monarch's diadem for ornament, but these for the sole and exclusive benefit of this earth, that being primary and paramount; the universe subordinate, or of no account or importance.

We notice here a slight apparent discrepancy between Moses and Dr. Gibson. The learned doctor says (referring to prior creations), "The heavens were not chaotic then." But the stars were not made, and the sun shone not until the fourth day. What was their previous condition? The work of creation was progressive, as is seen from this account, and consequently was not completed "in the beginning."

Six days were requisite to create the universe. A day in scripture may mean twenty-four hours, or from evening to evening. In prophetic language a day generally means a year. It may also mean a thousand years. It sometimes signifies an indefinite period, though generally limited or brief.

"And the evening and the morning were the sixth day. Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made" (Gen. i, 31, ii, 1–3). The world moves. Fifty years ago it would hav been sacrilege or blasphemy to hav said those seven days were not twenty-four hour days. Orthodoxy driven from that construction now takes refuge in the intrenchment that each of the six days signifies a geological period of unknown; perhaps incomprehensible duration. Very good. Then, according to analogy, the seventh day also would denote, and must be taken for, a geological period. If this be true, then, God has done nothing since he "ended his work" on the seventh day. Now all this muddle and confusion arises from not considering duly, and fully understanding, how God works, creates, or makes.

I hav no evidence that God creates as man makes an article. He puts in operation certain laws through which, in the lapse of ages or the requisite time, his proper work is evolved. There is no physical labor involved, no consequent fatigue, and from all our evidences there never has been a moment's cessation, suspension, or interruption in his works of creation, nor ever will be until infinite space shall be filled and occupied by the works and wonders of his creation. Moses gave the best cosmogony within his knowledge. Dr. Gibson says of it, "The Bible is not designed to teach science; it is apocalypse." What is its authority if its revelations are untruthful?

Fifty years hence I hazard the prediction that the Bible will be regarded as of no divine authority; its truths will not be more holy than truth generally, and all advanced thinkers will be emancipated from the shackles of priestcraft, bigotry, ignorance, and superstition, and the world will be blessed with the effulgence of the light of true religion and the knowledge of the one true and living God who exists in and through and independent of the forces of nature. JUIF.

THE Rev. John C. Young, of Danville, Ky., has been sent for to go to Louisville to deliver a course of lectures to stem the current of Infidelity there caused by our able orator Robert G. Ingersoll; with what success time will show.

PITTACUS of Mitylene made a law that he who, when drunk, committed an offense, would suffer double the punishment, which he would do if sober, and Plato and Aristotle applauded this as the hight of wisdom.

Finance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a recent TRUTH SEEKER is an article, touching on the finance question, over the signature of R. A. Van Winkle; and from the way he handles the subject I presume he thinks he has settled the whole question.

But, strange as it may seem to him, people will differ from him on this all-important question, as witness Mr. Morrison's article in the same issue and Mr. Louden's, the week before. And as these two articles are worth a year's subscription to the paper, I think the gentleman should subscribe for it instead of exchanging with his neighbor.

He says it would be ruinous to the Liberal cause to "join our fortunes with the flat greenback nonsense!" Did the gentleman ever see any money but flat money? Gold and silver are not money without the government flat or stamp on them. Nature has produced no money. It has only produced materials which governments may convert into money.

What is money anyhow? Nothing more nor less than a circulating medium of exchange, a more convenient way of doing business than by exchanging commodities in the way of barter.

Fifty years ago three-fourths of the business transactions of the country were done without the use of money. People provided themselves with the necessaries of life by swapping or by an exchange of produce called "barter," or "truck and dicker." As this was an inconvenient way of doing business, it gradually gave way and money took its place.

There is just as much money value in paper as there is in gold or silver. It is true there is a great difference in the intrinsic or market value, but there is no money value in either until it has the flat or stamp upon it of the government that issues it.

Money is not an end, but a medium to an end. We do not seek money for the sake of the money. We seek it because it possesses purchasing power; because with it we can buy whatever we want.

There is no reason why money should possess intrinsic value. The less the better, because it is just so much saved. All the intrinsic or market value there is in gold or silver when coined into money is just so much dead loss; because an article that has but very little intrinsic value in it will answer all the purposes of money just as well, or better.

A merchant on one side of the street has counter-scales with cast-iron weights, the intrinsic value of which is one dollar. On the other side of the street is a merchant with counter-scales with gold weights, the intrinsic value of which is one thousand dollars. Nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars of the last-named merchant's capital is a dead loss to him, because iron weights would answer equally as good purpose as his gold ones. The same rule will apply to money.

Again, he says, "No men or set of men, or government, can by a fiat giv purchasing power to any commodity of no intrinsic value, and it is folly to talk about it."

Well, the government did giv purchasing power to a commodity—paper—of but very little intrinsic value. He adds, "At least all must acknowledge that it is an untried experiment."

Well, it has been on trial for the last eighteen years, sanctioned by the Supreme Court, and proved to be the best money the people ever had, being as good as gold in every state and territory of the Union.

Again he says, "You might pay your debts that way (in greenbacks), but after it had answered for that purpose you could not compel any one to take it for wheat, pork, or beef, or wherewith to clothe or warm yourself."

True, neither can you compel any one to take gold or silver for "wheat, pork, beef, or wherewith to clothe or warm yourself," unless they choose to do so, but most people will choose to do so, and also take greenbacks just as readily.

It is all right for him, as far as it goes, to "fight the myths and absurdities of orthodox superstition" but if he has an eye to the signs of the times he will see we hav something to "fight" besides myths and orthodox superstition.

We hav a trinity in unity to fight—money-craft the father, church-craft the son, and Republican-craft, the unholy ghost, or in other words, the money-craft and church-craft are the power behind the Republican throne, or, again, the Republican party is under the control of the money and church power. And, as a Democrat, I am sorry to say, the Democrats, to a certain extent, are under the same control.

By a flank movement we may turn the right or left, or we may attack and pierce the center. But if we would "scotch the monster" we must make a bold attack, square in front, all along the line, and "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer." E. B. ROUNDS.

The Lockport Gathering.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Spiritualists and Liberals of Lockport, N. Y., met in convention on March 13th and 14th, a large attendance being present and great interest manifested throughout the entire session of three days. Mrs. Colby, who was present, dealt, as usual, masterly blows at ancient and modern superstitions, and pressed home with forcible arguments the necessity of organizing for purposes of defense against the growing encroachments of sectarian tyranny. A petition was presented, which was freely signed, for the taxation of church property. Thus we are striving inch by inch to gain the mastery, to plant Right in place of Might.

EMMA TAYLOR.

Letters from Friends.

ELK FALLS, KAN., Mar. 15, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: It has been a long time since you heard from me, but as I am about to emigrate I will offer a few words again. To begin with, I want my paper sent to Las Vegas, New Mexico.

Liberalism has not made much noise in this quarter, yet it has quietly and rapidly spread. Auxiliary League No. 155 was organized February 22d, with twenty-four charter members. Many more will join if a proper effort is made to enlarge and make it an active auxiliary. There are plenty of Liberals here, but it is difficult to induce them to take part in any kind of organization against the church. Some avoid it on account of their wives' feelings and some from fear of injury to business. This last is in imagination only, for the average Christian is smart enough to trade where he gets the most for his money; moreover, when a business man says he will not avow himself a Liberal lest he should drive away custom, he insults the better class of Christians by implying that they would be contemptible enough to prosecute for opinion's sake. He goes back on his principles and bestows his favors upon Christians by leaning that way and contributing to the church. In my opinion his contributions are thrown away, together with his independence, his only return being distrust from all parties. A Jew at Independence told me that by joining the League he saved $200 per annum. Heretofore, at regular intervals, a paper was carried around town, with a certain sum of money apportioned for each business man to pay toward the church, but when it was publicly known that he had joined the League a church committee lacked the brass to approach him for money; furthermore, if any had withdrawn their patronage they were the poorest class of customers he had.

But the greater portion of Liberals elude organization through sheer indifference. They seem to think that nothing will be lost by keeping quiet and nothing gained by agitation. I was once telling a man of the attempt being made to Christianize the government. His only reply was, "They can't do it." On calling the attention of another to the rapid and alarming progress of Catholicism which would some day result in religious war in this country, I was surprised to hear him say he hoped to God it would; that, he said, would open the people's eyes. Another, when told that his posterity might hav to wade in blood for the same privileges we now enjoy, replied: "Let them wade; I hav trouble enough in my days, let them hav theirs." But take them all through and they are on the side of liberty, and when the crisis comes they will vote with us and fight with us.

Henry Welty, president of our League, was elected Justice of the Peace in spite of a strong church opposition. J. A. Powell, one of the most outspoken Liberals in the county, was elected Sheriff last fall. Our postmaster is another Liberal. Other county officers are avowed Freethinkers. The three most successful physicians at Independence, Elk City, and Elk Falls are outspoken Atheists; but their opinions do not hurt their practice, for the most superstitious Christian has more faith in an Infidel doctor than in all three of his gods.

Thus, while we may fail in bringing about an extended organization for social benefit, we hav succeeded in introducing facts to the public mind, and hav the satisfaction of knowing that the best minds in our community are cognizant of what is going on, and well know how to act when the necessity arrives. Everywhere the League should be established to show to the world that the National Liberal League is not a paper concern, but has a foundation in fact. An organized effort to Christianize our government, if defeated in its object, can be defeated only by an organized effort. I make no war upon the other League, the American Liberal Union, and hope it will make no war upon us. Our objective point is the same, and our strength had better be expended in that direction. We hav been struck hard at the start by persecutions without and dissensions within, but it more prove more a stimulus than a hindrance to final success.

The imprisonment of D. M. Bennett was a hard blow to us out here, and the treatment he received at the hands of Liberals was equally hard; but we are outgrowing it, thinking that probably the worst is over. The agitation of this subject has developed one fact: the people prefer to take care of their own morals; and more, they are slowly but surely awakening to the necessity of doing it, if they would enjoy peace in this world. If there is anything that grinds out the sands of life before the time it is that harsh, upbraiding voice that shouts, "Why don't you do as I do?" It is the voice of the fiend that whispers in your ear, "I told you so."

We were recently favored with a lecture by M. F. Greene, a young man just entering the lecture field, and who has the brains, the courage, and the enthusiasm to make a first-class lecturer. The large hall was filled with people, and the best attention was given to the most radical sentiments of the speaker. Mr. Greene spoke to an audience of five hundred at Independence, and there, as elsewhere, he gave complete satisfaction to the Liberal public. Liberals should giv him a chance wherever he goes.

I presume you were not made aware of the death of Wm. Brown, one of the patrons of your paper, over a year ago. He was a man of good brain and good character, and died true to his convictions. Ministers and others waited on him toward the last, but his last request was that a Freethinker should officiate at his funeral. A funeral address was accordingly delivered by one of his Freethought friends, and though it was of radical tone and reflected the views held by the deceased, it was noticeable that its effect was more quieting and consoling to the mourners than so-called funeral sermons usually are. Among other things, the speaker said:

"And did he die a happy death? He died in the belief that death would end all pain, all misery. He died happy in the belief that neither he nor his wife nor children nor friends nor any human being would ever see the face of an angry God, nor hear that infamous command, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!'"

The speaker further showed that a Christian could not die happy, not knowing what would be the decree at the great judgment day. Even if he could foretell his own case, he could not die happy with the thought that other fellow-beings would go to eternal torments. If such a one could die a happy death it was because the sweetest charities of the heart had been crushed out by a blinding, bigoted faith, that left its victim more fiend than human.

Others about here hav died in a similar manner, and it is getting to be understood that a human being may quit living without that "blessed consolation."

Hoping to be able to occasionally send you the name of a new subscriber, I remain Yours truly, A. A BARNES.

NORTH VASSALBORO, ME., Mar. 10, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I wish to write a little letter to the dear friends of your paper, not because I can say much or say it very well. I can say that I know my heart is warm with love to the cause of truth and the friends who advocate the same in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Zeal and labor are manifest almost everywhere in organizing Liberal Leagues. How my soul swells with gratitude as I read from week to week of the steadily-increasing number of Leagues springing up in so many places—one hundred and sixty-nine Leagues and several others forming! The small acorn is making a big oak. Don't be disheartened, friends, because some hav been torn from dear ones and cast into a foul, filthy, Christian hell. The chains will soon be sundered and the enslaved made free, not through Christianity but by a higher power. My soul cries out for the shackles to be removed and real liberty to take their place.

Our good brothers, Leland, Walker, and some others, say much of "natural morality." I say Amen! every time to their honest utterances. I hope they may continue to teach the people a higher code of morals. It requires warm, brave hearts to face old, respectable orthodoxy, that stands loafing on the street corners, making faces and crying "obscenity." But there are some who don't scare worth a cent, who will promulgate their sincere convictions of what they know to be right and wrong.

The social as well as other reforms are agitated in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hail this as an omen of a near change in the old, worn-out marriage institution. Friends, you write and discuss this matter well. I pray you to keep the ball rolling. It will soon become a large mountain, filling the earth. To others who are afraid to let their light shine I would say, "Don't be afraid to 'speak in meetin'.'" Those of us who can neither lecture nor write scientific articles can write a few words for reform papers, just to let true believers know on which side the fence we belong. I can assure you thousands will rejoice to learn that you know and love the truth as it exists in natural law. We need to become acquainted with each other. Even the name and residence seem to giv quite an insight in this matter of friends.

In your paper of March 6th I notice the whole account of the particulars of the Leagues formed. This is what I hav long wished to learn. Oh, what an army for good, and still increasing! Friends, take courage; we hav everything to cheer. You hav started well. Perseverance will gain the victory. How much I wish to be able to cast my mite into the treasury! but I hav been disabled for two years, owing to rheumatism, caused by mercurial poison. I would sow broadcast thousands of reform papers where I now can scatter only a few.

The Freelover who discusses marriage in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER no doubt had a good reason for not signing her name. I much prefer to see the real name, still I would much rather she would write again with no name than not write at all. Please hand out more discussions. You will hav plenty of eager readers.

Poor Bennett is still suffering in a gloomy prison alone—all alone! I shudder to think that Christians or devils would make such places just to torture. O Liberals and all reformers, you are angels indeed, laboring to overturn all such wicked institutions and let the captive go free! You hav begun a work that cannot be stopped. All who hav been imprisoned or suffered persecution in any way will be fully rewarded in time. Truly yours,

EMELINE A. PRESCOTT.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., March 11, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find draft for $15, which you will place to the credit of the parties named below. Three dollars will pay my subscription for this year. It was not lack of sympathy that kept me so long from writing and sending in my subscription, but I had the promise of a few more subscribers to our most glorious, and for every true Liberal really indispensable TRUTH SEEKER, the best Liberal paper published, hence the delay. I shall do all in my power to circulate and get subscribers for it. If your enemies expect to crush and stop the paper by sending its bold and fearless editor to a Christian prison for committing no crime, they find, while E. Macdonald occupies the editorial chair, the task a hard one, as he has proved to be the right man in that place in your absence.

I hope the Christian bloodhound Comstock will after this adopt a let-alone policy toward you and your paper, as he will hav undoubtedly learned by this time that your friends do not all liv in the city of New York, and that they cannot be counted by the half dozen, but can be counted by thousands, and that those thousands are distributed all over this fair country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And while our enemies delight in reading their Bible, with all its obscenity, fables, myths, and stories, and swallow Jonah, whale and all, as the inspired word of God, we want THE TRUTH SEEKER to make its regular weekly visits to our humble homes.

While you are in a felon's cell you hav won the admiration, esteem, and sympathy of all good Liberals, as you are made a martyr for our cause. It is an open secret that it is not obscenity but you and your paper they would like to crush out of existence. Your unjust imprisonment has won thousands to the Liberal ranks. It shows what we Liberals would have if the church had the power. But thanks to such men as our hero in prison, that power they will never regain any more. But we must be watchful of what we hav gained, must be united to be strong, and show our strength when demanding our rights, and getting them granted will only be a question of time.

The Liberals here arranged lately for a course of lectures, which were delivered by Mr. O. A. Phelps. He had full houses every night, and was much applauded by his intelligent audience. We are trying now to arrange for a debate. I think the plan a good one, as in giving lectures and debates on Bible questions we reach the masses and set them to thinking. Mr. Phelps is a man of great ability. He is doing a great work in the Liberal cause, and ought to be constantly employed in the lecture field. We can recommend him to the Liberals of the West.

Yours in love and sympathy, SUSAN REICHERTER.

WEST MERIDEN, CONN., March 11, 1880.

MR. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: I hav the pleasure to send you sixty-seven names on the petition to Congress. I circulated it on my own hook, as it seems that all Liberals are afraid of the church. They don't like to face Christians. Even Mr. Griswold, president of our Liberal League, on the 10th of last month, showed himself on the stage for the benefit of the Universalist church. I might hav got more names but I was forbidden to go through the establishment. But I shall try yet, and if I succeed will send to you.

We hav in Meriden a Sunday row these four or five weeks. I wanted to join a funeral society, Knights of Honor, but they refused to accept me as a member on account of my Infidelity.

I am sorry that I am not able at present to send something substantial for Mr. Bennett, but am glad to see that he has so many good friends. I only wish for the day to come when he will get free from the Christian Inquisition; it will be a day of rejoicing for all Liberals.

I would like to hav Mr. Bennett's new book, but cannot order at present, as I don't know yet that I shall be able to pay for it. If I can afford it I shall send.

You don't know how much I wish to see Liberals, Spiritualists, and Greenbackers join together next fall.

Please give my very best respects to Mr. and Mrs. Bennett and accept the same yourself.

Yours for justice, JOSEPH FRANKOWSKI.

LAKE MILLS, IOWA, March 15, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: I am a few days behind the regulation of your edition, but it's better late than never. It is not because I had not the money, neither is it because my faith is faltering, nor my blushing face of Infidelity, but I had not the opportunity to purchase a money order, that I might send you the money with safety. You know that we liv in a Christian land, where we all observe the Golden Rule. But we are obliged to keep our houses and barns locked, and to support jails and state prisons and poor-houses, and all other necessary objects to protect society at large.

I send you a postal order for one year's subscription for that good messenger called THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the title of the publication, because I do love the principle of truth, let it come from what source it may. Reason, one of the best gifts that universal law ever gave to man, is searching after the truth. Reason deals with truth and fact; myths of all kinds are a gibberish lot of mysteries. I like your paper for its independence, its liberty of speech, and the position that it takes upon all topics that hav a tendency to elevate man to a higher and more noble plane in his nature than we find him in this Christian age. To do this he must be left free to think and act and speak and write on all points that will hav any tendency to progress to a higher state of morals than we hav at the present.

I like those letters that you publish; they sound just as good to my ear as the testimony given in behalf of Jesus Christ in the class meetings for the satisfaction of the robbing ministry in charge. If Jesus had in his nature the modesty of a Voltaire or a Paine he would be compelled to blush with shame if he should once see and hear the testimony given by the poor weak-minded, deluded witnesses testifying for his cause, all for the purpose of advertising themselves to the ministry.

Those telling shots of that strong mind of Mrs. Slenker are just the ammunition that is required to scatter and break up the works of old theology. All such ammunition should be used more freely. I would that every one who can wield the pen with telling effect would arm himself with the principles of truth and liberty, in every sense of those words, and go to work in earnest for their rights.

Yours for the right, S. D. WADSWORTH.

HOMESTEAD, MICH., March 7, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: In looking over my books I found that I had made a little mistake in the time that I had taken the paper, and it ain't to be wondered at under the circumstances. I joined a Congregational colony that was granted by the Legislature of this state, and soon found out that the people would not allow any one to liv near their colony unless they were strictly orthodox. I told them I was not orthodox and that they could not drive me out. They then pitched on me, stole my household goods to the amount of four hundred dollars, and one of their ministers ran off with my wife; then they brought me to law under pretense of some action. I followed them to the high courts for four years and beat them there. After that they sued me for contempt of court for putting what little I had left out of the way of the lawyers. The judge then fined me one hundred dollars and sentenced me to six months' imprisonment in the county jail for no crime whatever. I hav served my time in the jail, and I now stay in my little habitation and guard it with a load of arms, and they well understand it too. I now stand here as an independent Liberal fighting the battles of equal rights and privileges.

Now, you see, under these circumstances, I know how to sympathize with Mr. Bennett. When the petition was sent out to get signers for the release of Mr. Bennett, I worked six faithful days in the belly of this orthodox hell and got fifty signers; that was the best I could do.

Inclosed find three dollars. I would send more, but I am an old man, seventy-five years of age, my health is poor, and I am in rather low circumstances. S. K. CARTER.

ALTON, ONT., March 6, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Thinking it not unlikely that many of the readers of your paper would be glad to be informed of the state of public opinion in this or any other part of Canada upon the great (shall I say burning?) questions of the day, I hav taken the liberty of addressing to you a few words as to the progress of Liberalism in this vicinity.

Here, as everywhere else, the modern spirit of investigation has penetrated, and doubt and discussion hav, with many, taken the place of faith and dogmatism. Canadians are proverbially a conservative people, slow to change their views, but steadfast in convictions, new or old, which hav been once established.

Freethinkers are as yet comparatively few in numbers in this country; but being strong in argument and ever ready to defend their opinions by appeal to the tribunal of reason, their advance is, if slow, sure and irresistible. Unlike the Lord who was with Judah, who could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley because they had chariots of iron, the god of science is driving out of every refuge all those who hav chosen to dwell in the paper citadel of biblical inspiration. Of course the hirelings of superstition are by no means inactive, and recently at a neighboring town one of the paid defenders of the old creed made the usual effort to draw out the leviathan with a hook. Col. Ingersoll was represented by this clerical Boanerges as a wretched hypocrite, defaming Christianity for bread and blaspheming against the Most High for the pew-money of his services of sin. But we know, and the reverend gentleman knows too, that the arrow cannot make him flee; sling-stones are turned with him into bubbles; darts are counted as stubble; he laugheth at the shaking of a spear; he is a king over all the children of pride. The way in which some of our Canadian defenders of the faith abuse the leaders of modern thought might well cause an onlooker to imagine that they had been given the heathen for an inheritance and had already entered into possession.

Liberty of speech is not nearly so extended in the Dominion as among the citizens of the great republic, and men do not so freely express their dissent from the religion of the state, for, although we hav no state church, we hav a state religion; consequently unbelievers are not yet so outspoken in Canada as is desirable. Many of us would, therefore, like to hear Col. Ingersoll lecture at, say Toronto, in order that weak-kneed brethren might be confirmed in the truth by meeting together and learning the extent of their numbers. Truth, we well know, does not depend upon numbers, but exemption from social persecution and ecclesiastical tyranny to a very great degree does so depend.

Your paper is highly prized by its readers in this neighborhood. We know thy works and thy labor and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil; and how thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars.

Yours fraternally, A. F. Thomson.

Kalamazoo, Mich., March 8, 1880.

Mr. D. M. Bennett: I hav just returned home after an absence of four months. Inclosed find three dollars. Times are hard here, and we all find it quite difficult to get much money laid by. You can consider me a life-long supporter to your paper.

I shall be glad when the grand old hero, my friend D. M. Bennett, shall hav served out his time and is once more a free man. I hav some fears that Comstock will again cause his arrest, but I hope he will not.

I do hope Mr. Underwood will soon acknowledge his mistake in speaking against our friend D. M. Bennett and come out fully and take sides again with the Liberal League and let Abbot drift off alone again into orthodoxy.

I think that one of the grandest acts in the life of our hero, D. M. Bennett, is the letter he wrote to Mr. Hayes stating that he was sorry he or his friends had troubled him so much by so many petitions (names to the number of two hundred thousand), and regretting that his wife and friends, together with himself, had ever asked his clemency, justice, or mercy, and withdrawing all such requests. That, I say, is the grandest act of his life. Such an act on the part of Mr. Hayes shows him up just where he stands, and, I think, will be of material help to our cause in awakening people to a just sense of free justice. Mr. Hayes's wife, no doubt, controls him. I shall never vote again for a president that belongs to a church or one who is unwilling to dispense equal justice to all.

I am glad to learn of the progress the cause is making in forming Leagues all over the country. Our League here is a failure so far; we had twenty charter-members to start off with, and went no further than to get a temporary organization. I will make further inquiry into the matter, and expect at no distant day to hav an excellent Liberal League. If some good speaker was here for a few days to help us, I am certain we could soon hav a nice League. I cannot do much for the cause on account of my being away from home so much.

Please put my name down for Bro. Bennett's forthcoming book, written while in the Albany Penitentiary.

Yours respectfully, James S. Bedel.

Editor of The Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: It is some weeks since I hav found a convenient time to write to you, but I trust that you know, by your own sympathies, that you are never forgotten by your friends, and since you are being visited by "gods," I hope they do not forget to carry you loving sympathies from us all. I am so glad to know by your letters, that your spirit is not broken by your imprisonment, and that you can even ridicule the ridiculous. Well, you will soon, I trust, be with us again, and enjoy the sunlight of nature in all its beauties (how sweet it will be to you!) and the loving presence of friends. Do you think Mr. Abbot is really in the possession of his reason, or has he lost it by and through his temper? I should think if he were really possessed of his reason and had a moderate share of common sense, his life would be anything but peaceful. I fairly shouted as I read the letter of our dear friend, Amy Post, addressed to him. Doesn't she hit the nail squarely, when she "hurls back his accusations of obscenity?" and Elizur Wright's "Anti-Liberty Logic," must be an exceedingly bitter pill to swallow. Let us hope that all these things which are being and hav been said will help to open the eyes of many to the difference between morals and superstition, and so benefit the world.

I inclose the remainder of my donation, which was to be fifty cents per month, while your imprisonment lasted. It is very small, but I am a very small woman.

Truly your friend, Lucy N. Colman.

Editor Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: Herewith is $3 to pay my subscription to The Truth Seeker, the boldest and most radical newspaper in the world. By your courage and labor for humanity you hav won a name in the list of the world's martyrs and heroes not excelled in ancient or modern times. And when the trinity, religion, ignorance, and oppression, shall be looked upon as the iron bonds that cursed humanity, and shall hav passed away, then will you be loved and revered as the real savior of your fellow-man, who gave your life and liberty that your fellows should hav knowledge and freedom. Yours, P. V. Wise.

Centerville, Or., Feb. 12, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Go right on with your paper in the future as you hav done in the past, independent and fearless. The truths that you hav told hav secured for you the hatred and ill will of the Christians. They will swear falsely against you in the future as they hav done in the past.

I am a new subscriber to The Truth Seeker, but an old friend and occasional reader. Compose yourself in your imprisonment as best you can. Endeavor to keep sane and retain all your power of intellect, for all good Liberal people want you to finish writing your new book. I think of you almost daily, and often speak of you, to the disgust and chagrin of the clergy. By all means advocate the taxation of church property. I am well pleased with the present management of your paper. Put me down for a copy of your new book. John D. Edgar.

Friend Bennett: The Truth Seeker is a welcomed visitor to the Liberals in this conservative state. It is doing a good work, and thriving and prospering in spite of the attack made upon it by those unprincipled imps who pretend to be working for the Liberal cause. Liberalism is rapidly advancing under the present conditions, and if the Liberals would be more united it would advance still faster. When we look back and see what a short time ago, comparatively, people began to be skeptical in regard to Christianity, and see what advancement Liberalism has made in that time, we should calculate that before another centennial shall be celebrated old Father Time will pluck a feather from the wing of the angel Gabriel, sharpen it with the two-edged sword of God Almighty, dip it in the blood of Jesus, and by the flickering, fading light of hell he will write in words of fire across the name of Christianity, "Religion of the past." Hoping that that day is not far distant, I remain your friend, Paul Dillingham.

Crystal Springs, N. Y., Feb. 12, 1880.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: It is refreshing to observe the fact that men hav discovered that they hav a mind of their own, an intelligent power within when properly exercised and developed that is as comprehensive and reliable as any that ever held a divine commission, and that a partial God no longer inflates his pets with wisdom to be distributed at their pleasure among the ignorant masses. These men who assert that they are the vicegerents of him who sits on the Almighty throne are now required to show their credentials. And since they fail in that, and there clusters around the presumptuous assertion the odor of bread and butter, doubts naturally arise and the divine agent who claims to hold the great panacea of human wrongs and vices is regarded in the same manner as the vender of the great panticureal cordial that cures all diseases incident to the human family, even to the restoring to life and health the person who had been blown into a thousand fragments by the explosion of a hundred pounds of dynamite. Did God choose these oracles, he certainly many times would make better selections or else he is a God of very bad taste and judgment? Did the Almighty extend a call to T. L. Weaver a short time ago to carry the mantle and blow the horn of Roger Williams after the Genesee Methodist Episcopal Conference had pronounced upon him the sentence that followed disobedience in Eden and seen proper to portray some of his chief characteristics, thus, "Sabbath breaking; dishonesty in business, including something of the nature of forgery and unchastity?"

Perhaps the Rev. R. B. Stanton, who conducted the young man through the ceremonies of the saving ordinance, thought him better qualified to follow the examples of Paul, who said, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile" (2 Cor., xii, 16); also, "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7), and the practices of the old rake who lay so near God's heart, with his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines.

How beautiful the system that loads a young man of such attainments with celestial honors, while you, for sending a little polemic on a certain institution through the mails, are languishing in prison! Your misfortune is that you are not within the ark. With a looser sense of propriety you would hav been found there, and then the publication of such lovely stories as Lot's incest with his daughters (Gen. xix); the little social chat of Jacob and Rachel about the act of Jacob in seducing their maid-servant Belhah; also the story of Lea and Zilpah, and the bargains between Leah and Rachel about Reuben's mandrakes (Gen. xxx); also the story of Abram and Sarah, and the account of his illicit intimacy with his servant-maid Hagar, as related in Gen. xvi; also the story of Absalom's familiarity with his father's concubines, as related in 2 Sam. xvi, 32; and the narrative of Judah, Onan, and Tamar (Gen. xxxviii) could be flourished in bold type as genuine specimens of orthodox morality; but, thanks to common sense, such morality is not printed and circulated outside of the ark and its influences, for, if Infidels could hav their say, our public schools at least would soon be rid of the nuisance.

Similar cases of such orthodox morality too numerous to mention could be given had I the time and space to giv them. And had you been a printer of orthodox obscenity you could hav dilated upon the beauties of the doctrine without a murmur or complaint save from lost Infidels who cannot be made to renounce their reason and swallow down such doctrines as ordained and inspired of God. Yes, Bro. Bennett, had you belonged to the ark this orthodox morality could hav been carried to any extent with impunity, for it has its precedent in the patriarchs and wisest men of God's chosen favorites. Erect a standard of morals upon the Bible, and you can erect any there you please, and quantities of pulpit hirelings will sustain its merits, and any criticism of its depravity would be thoroughly rebuked. In fact, discard reason and common sense. Off with your own head, and then you can stand an upright and senseless orthodox without a blush. Follow Moody, who says: "I never reason on religion; none but the disciples of the devil reason. It is dangerous to reason on religion." Be an idiot and a fool. Yield a servile submission to the Moodies and you are a man. What a burlesque on man, Return to the primitive fathers described by Darwin and then plant yourself on faith, a halo of glory brightens around you. David and Solomon your associates, and you can establish as many harems as you please.

Now faith is a very essential element in the Christian's composition. Faith removes mountains. St. John says (vii, 38), "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." That is a good thing for a man to hav, be he gentile or Jew, especially if he has manufacturing tastes. His water power would be easily transported, while the poor sinner is compelled to locate his machinery where nature has seen proper to fix her waterfalls and cascades. A person of large faith would be useful at the metropolis, or Chicago, etc., etc., because in cases of fire they would be kept standing around ready to undam. I see now why the sinner can hav no faith; because he would destroy the great design of punishment hereafter by extinguishing the eternal fires. Why wouldn't faith be better than to irrigate in the colony of Greeley? Hence faith is not only necessary for man's salvation, but it is of great practical value. It is by faith we see the earth created out of nothing and stamped with such geological evidences as to lead scientific men to think it was created millions of years before it was. It is by faith that we can see a serpent engage with a woman in conversation so fascinating as to lead her to disobey the command of the Almighty and defeat his design. It is by faith that we can see a man liv three days in a whale's belly. It is by faith that we can see the Lord disappointed in his creatures' goodness, and drown them to prevent further disobedience. It is by faith that we can see the sun stand still that a work of slaughter may go on. It is by faith that we can see three men walking unharmed in a red-hot furnace. It is by faith we can view the miraculous conception and see God allow his offspring to be born in a manger; that offspring heal the sick, restore sight to the blind, raise the dead, and finally go up from the earth without wings in spite of the laws of gravitation; but no amount of faith could induce us to believe such a story in these days even if it was loaded with tales of angels to corroborate it.

Now, Bro. Bennett, since orthodoxy has seen fit to rail so much about your immorality and that of all Infidels and their Liberal Leagues, like Robert Cooper, I would ask, What morality is there in the following account of the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the "Savior" of the world, one whose origin, above all other beings, should hav been honorable and illustrious. He quotes from Dr. Alexander Walker. "It is remarkable," says he, "that in the genealogy of Christ only four women hav been named; Tamar, who seduced the father of her late husband; Rachel, a common prostitute; Ruth, who, instead of marrying one of her cousins, went to bed with another of them; and Bathsheba, an adultress, who espoused David, the murderer of her first husband." What a pedigree! and for the "son of God," too. I should be ashamed of such an origin.

Now, Bro. Bennett, can't you show a better one? I'll venture to bet you can, and that not one Infidel can be found with a poorer one. But wicked and immoral as the orthodox hav tried to present you to the world, even they will hav to admit that your moral character is as pure as the snow by the side of many whose names are found upon church books, and far superior to their Bible Moses, Noah, Abram, Jacob, Shechem, Reuben, Judah, Onan, Hosea, David, Solomon, and hosts of others too numerous to mention, to say nothing of their Bible godly women.

How animating and edifying the story of these Bible heroes must be for children and young ladies and gentlemen in a social chat or evening entertainment. And since they think their Bible such a model of morality, and you are aware it is so little read and understood, don't you think it would be a good idea for them to represent it on the stage in the form of a drama? If they should, and make it as real as Booth does Shakspere, it would certainly draw; the Black Crook, or any other leg show, would be eclipsed and thrown into the shade. And then there is the sainted Rev. Joe Cook, who feels so much alarmed at the spread of Infidelity, he might stay the tide, or at least wonderfully increase the numbers of his hearers, by securing the services of Rutherford B. Hayes, Mrs. Van Cott, Sara Underwood, and Messrs. Bundy, Abbot, Crosby, Colgate, Anthony Comstock, and a few others equally as pure and strong in the faith, as soloists, with the Young Men's Christian Association for chorus, and Judge Benedict for drill-master, and sing Solomon's Songs. It could not fail to produce wonderful effects, and multitudes would throng to hear them, especially if they sung with the spirit and understanding, and then he could instil into their minds the beauty and morality of inspiration, and how much more essential it is to hav faith than reason. Yes, Bro. Bennett, you must down with your reason and cling to faith, for with plenty of faith all inconsistencies are made palatable. It is by faith we can see that the few are called of God to administer spiritual morsels to the gaping multitude. It is by faith we see it takes three to make one. It is by faith we can see the New Jerusalem with its streets of gold. It is by faith we can see the sinner writhing in the agonies of eternal torment. It is surprising how many things we can see by the eye of faith. How it opens the eyes and sharpens the vision. It is by faith we see how good all are within the church; how bad all are without. The necessity of spies and decoys at the heels of those outside, while none are needed within; the necessity of jailing editors of scientific journals, while holy libertines should not be exposed. Perhaps they are aware, from the immorality of church members almost daily exposed, that if all immorality was removed from the church, there would be but few left; that "but few are chosen." Jesus tells us who are the blessed, the salt of the earth (Matt. v, 44). "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." Don't you find them numerous? It is astonishing how plenty they are. If you fail to see them, it is only for want of faith. You can see anything then and believe anything if you hav enough of it. You will find it a good thing to carry about with you, for without it even presidents hav no regard for your liberties. But hold!

Inclosed you will find $3 00, which please place to my credit for The Truth Seeker. Yours for reason,

James S. Mead.

Taylor, Ill., Feb. 24, 1880.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed six dollars for the paper and "Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated." I would like to send more, but circumstances will not permit at present. I read your paper with much pleasure, and greatly admire its noble editor. I know no bounds to my indignation at the manner in which Hayes has treated you, and consider him unfit to be called a President; and as for that dirty sneaking Comstock & Co., their meanness is beyond description, and there ought to be a power to control or stay their proceedings. I sometimes wish there was an orthodox hell; and, if there is such a place, I know Comstock & Co. will get a good scorching.

I greatly admire Mr. Eugene Macdonald and all the other noble and brave defenders of our much-loved editor. I truly sympathize with Mrs. Bennett, and know how sad her heart must hav been when she returned from Washington without success. I would say to her, Be as strong as is possible, for your strength will greatly assist your dear companion in bearing the confinement which has so unjustly been thrust upon him.

I am greatly grieved that I cannot do more for The Truth Seeker and its brave editor. My husband is quite a cripple from his injury—a broken and dislocated hip.

As ever, your friend, Tryphenia A. Irey.

Friend Bennett: Inclosed you will find post-office order for four dollars and thirteen cents to pay you what I owe you and to pay for one year's subscription to the paper from February 15, 1880. I sincerely hope the paper will prosper in all of its good work for all time to come, and the readers of that noble paper will seek the truth in its naked form and learn more and more to be honest and upright citizens, not through the fear of the laws of our land or the fear of being burnt for ever and ever hereafter, but let us learn and practice more truth and teach it to our fellow-beings, then we will be blessed by all that know us. Let our homes be made as pleasant as means will allow, and teach our dear children it is honest to get their bread by the sweat of their brow. Yours truly, W. H. H. Stebbins.

"Truth Crushed to Earth Will Rise Again."

DEDICATED TO D. M. BENNETT, THE VICTIM OF A HEARTLESS, DESIGNING DASTARD.

BY WILL O. HUTCHINGS.

Upon the wondrous tides of years that flow
Into the past from out the present, all aglow
With hopes and fears and aspirations high,
How few the mighty names not doomed to die!
The world, in its primeval ignorance and hate,
Once made the lives of nature's heroes desolate:
Deprived them of their joys, home, friends and all,
And gave them in their stead the coffin and the pall.

Nor has that spirit of injustice died since then;
The times hav only changed, not changed are men
Who think—because their fathers thought—the creed is right
That sends o'er all the world oppression's gloomy night.
'Tis thus that he who strives to benefit his fellow-man
By teaching him of nature and her wondrous plan,
Who labors with untiring zeal the lesson to impart
That God is not in heaven, but in the human heart;

Who thinks and dares express the honest thought
That "man's humanity to man" will never end in naught;
Who scorns the supposition that an endless hell
Has been created for us because Adam fell;
Who could not cast his lot in heaven if he could,
While by salvation's plan the noble, wise, and good
Must pass in dark and gloomy hell eternity away,
While murderers and thieves in heaven their deity obey.

'Gainst him it is that those who are called men
Will rise in fury, and will then again,
If they but dare, repeat the crime that Calvin wrought,
And bury 'neath oblivion's waves all liberty of thought
The ones who hold all rank and caste in scorn,
And mingle with the brave, though lowly born,
The world will fetter with the chains of shame,
While base, plebeian minds of gain the heroes name.

'Twas true of Shakspere in the drama's youth,
'Twas so in France when Voltaire fought for truth;
'Twas true in Ireland when great Emmet fell,
And true of our great martyr now in a prison-cell.
But yet swift coming ages, as they roll around
From out the future, with its mysteries profound,
Will make the glorious right come round at last
And wipe away the stains that o'er man's name were cast.

Though wrong may seem the right, and triumph for awhile,
Though ignorance may curse and bigotry revile,
Yet as progression's car rolls on the hosts of wrong will part.
And justice, liberty, and love abide in every heart.
Men are wiser than they were, and growing wiser still,
They're plucking from their hearts injustice and ill-will,
At last they'll bring a chaplet fair, and every flower a gem,
And place it on the martyr's brow, a royal diadem.

The End of the Play.

And is the farce of life nigh over,
The laughter and the dancing done?
Hav we now run the game to cover?
Well, we've had our fun.

Is now the "the banquet hall deserted?"
And is the crystal goblet dry?
Now merry nights and song departed?
Well, we made them fly.

And is the good ship anchored lying,
The broad deep sea all dark and grim,
While overhead the storm clouds flying?
Well, we've had our swim.

Is all the garden grandeur vanished,
And heavy snow lies like a pall?
The roses gone, the songsters banished?
Well, we culled them all.

Why should we mourn? the curtain falling
Shuts out the light of busy day,
Ring up! we hear the prompter calling
New actors to the play.

Life's but a shifty scene we're playing,
A pageant on the world's wide stage.
Our part is done; there, no delaying!
Off, and take the wage!

Revelations of Antichrist

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health."

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

A BEAUTIFUL behavior is better than a beautiful form. It is the finest of the fine arts.—Emerson.

WE may, perhaps, hav gone a little too far or too fast; but we hav reason on our side, and when one has reason on one's side one should hav the courage to run some risks.—Napoleon I.

BE truthful, but do not consider it sincere to say rude things. Love must bear its part in your talk as well as truth; and one can be sincere and yet withhold what will giv needless pain.—Unity.

THAT tree which has known only gentle breezes is never very deeply rooted; but the oak which has had to wrestle with the wind for very existence finds its vigor in that same life-struggle. Not equality, but emulation, is the key-note to universal progress.—Anon.

DANTE'S assertion that the majority of mankind are born "only to manure the earth," and Carlyle's, that England contains so many millions, "mostly fools," are not very flattering to our vanity, but they nevertheless represent one side of a very important truism.—Anon.

POTATOES are made to grow by putting them into the ground and then after tilling. This planting and tilling is called work. This is the only way potatoes were ever known to be produced. Faith and prayer never yet produced a potato, and they never will.—Anon.

As that man cannot set a right value upon health who has never known sickness, nor feel the blessings of ease who has been through life a stranger to pain, so can there be no confirmed and passionate love of truth for him who has not experienced the hollowness of error.—Coleridge.

OUR soundest knowledge of God is to know that we know him not as indeed he is, neither can know him, and that our safest eloquence concerning him is our silence, whereby we confess, without confession, that his glory is inexplicable, his greatness beyond our capacity and reach.—Richard Hooker.

RELIGION should be the guardian of public morality and prevent men from going astray into the paths of dishonesty; religion should staud by our side and call out to man, "Your salvation is the truthfulness in perfect honesty and sincerity." If you wish my definition of religion, I will say religion, if it is anything, is the very science of sincerity.—Prof. Adler.

THERE is a great deal of religion in not going to church in this age. The man who refuses to support or sanction the preaching of a theology which he believes to be false and pernicious, is to be praised; there is honesty in his act. Such a man sets a good example to the world, which is the utmost of human action. This kind of independence is needed to-day in society.—L. K. Washburn.

A DEEP sense of life destroys the fear and almost the idea of death. Men fear death as children fear to go into the dark; and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. . . It is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant perhaps the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one who is wounded in hot blood, who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt.—Bacon's Essays.

THE whole Christian world has become incrusted with dogma and formulism. Great importance is attached to beliefs and creeds, and the essentials of Christianity, including its vital center, are almost forgotten. The church is overloaded with superstition and nonsensical beliefs and sacred falsehoods. What is the cure for all this? The law of checks and balances has its office here and it has begun its operations through the skepticism of the scientists.—Dr. Holland.

WITHIN a few years it has been found, by the discovery of Sinaitic and other very ancient manuscripts of the New Testament, that some of its most admired passages are forgeries—medieval additions to the original text. It is sad to learn that the utterance of our Lord on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," is not to be found in some of the old manuscripts, and that the words, "Bless them that curse you," etc. (Matt, v. 44), must be swept away from the sacred text.—Prof. Wm. Matthews.

AT the present day Christianity, as a religious system, is on the wane just as surely as the pagan religion was sixteen hundred years ago. Its many positive excellences, its moral purity, its teachings of brotherhood, charity, and forgiveness, remain, and will ever remain, as permanent blessings to mankind. But its deification of Jesus, its claim to being the prophetical faith of faiths, its supernatural stories, its more recently manufactured creeds, with their revolting dogmas and inconsistencies, . . . are steadily crumbling away.—J. L. Stoddard.

INFIDELS do not believe in chance; we do not believe it possible for chance or accident to do everything mentioned by Moses. We do not believe chance, accident, or power, in or out of the universe, could by any possibility create something from nothing, or make a man of pure dust and a woman of his rib; make a snake talk; make plants before they grew; make a tree of knowledge; make cherubims with flaming swords; make men live nine hundred and sixty-nine years; make sons of God who would unite with women of earth and bear giants to them; make a flood to cover all the earth; make the ark story tally with fact and reason; make the plagues of Egypt a real occurrence, and hundreds of other silly, childish, Mosaic feats equally incredible.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

GENESIS I.: II.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by D. M. BENNETT.

A Few Words About the Devil,

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

Notes and Clippings.

THE wine cellar of a deceased priest in France contained 2,000 bottles of wine—for communion probably.

THE Catholics demanded of the Swiss Federal government that Epiphany, the Purification of the Virgin Mary, and the festival of the Immaculate Conception should be declared legal holidays. The government objected to adding three holidays to those already in the almanac, and refused the demand.

METHODISTS, Baptists, Presbyterians, and others hav for some years enjoyed their denominational watering places and seaside resorts. Now the Quakers hav determined to be even with them, and hav purchased 400 acres on Brigantine Beach, N. J., for $40,000. These solid people do not believe in owing money, and therefore pay hard cash for the property.

A PETITION is being circulated in this city by the friends of D. M. Bennett, who was imprisoned through the agency of Comstock. The petition is being largely signed. The defense set up against the law is that it puts too great power in the hands of persons who can misuse it. By this law it is claimed that postmasters may open any letter under the pretense of looking for something nasty. By this means the political party in power can easily obtain all the movements of the other parties. The law is obnoxious to liberty-loving Americans. If criminals are to be hunted up, let the mails remain sacred.—Ex.

THE Secretary of the Spelling Reform Association reports that, besides the Chicago Tribune and Home Journal, there are two hundred papers in all parts of the country that hav adopted, in whole or in part, the modified spelling, and are trying to prepare the minds of readers for a still further change. The rules at present in force are as follows: 1. Omit a from the digraf ea when pronounst as e short, as in hed, helth, etc. 2. Omit silent e after a short vowel, as in hav, giv, definit, infinit, forbad, etc. 3. Write f for ph in such words as alfabet, fantom, camfor, filosofy, telegraf, etc. 4. When a word ends with a doubl letter, omit the last, as in shal, wil, clif, eg, etc. 5. Change ed final to t where it has the sound of t, as in lasht, impresst, fixt, etc.

IN his report for the last quarter of 1879, the Registrar of the Scotch parish of Glenelg says: "No entry has been made in the marriage register for the year now ended." This happened before in 1871, when it was pointed out that an undue proportion of the population consisted of "old maids." The Registrar fears that the proportion of this class is increasing. The Registrar of Laggan writes: "Marriage appears to hav gone out of fashion. Only three marriages hav been celebrated during the last two years." The Nairn Registrar says: "A year has now passed since the 'Marriage Notice act' came into operation, but the board has not once been used." The returns of bastardy, meanwhile, are very heavy in Scotland, where the Sabbath is so zealously kept.

THERE is considerable excitement in colored Episcopal circles in Washington, and among the white brethren too for that matter. The Rev. Dr. Crummell is pastor of St. Luke's M. E. church, and, like many other clergymen, the management of his choir is the most difficult portion of his duties. Mr. Fleetwood was appointed as chorister, as his friends claimed, with the doctor's consent. The latter, however, declares that he did nothing of the kind. A very animated epistolary warfare has been in progress between the parties, as Mr. Fleetwood naturally expects a pecuniary recompense for his vocal services. He has been practicing for some time for the Easter services, and several affidavits are in course of preparation to sustain him in his demand. The affair has caused quite a stir, and in its final settlement the highest courts known to the Episcopal church will probably be called upon before the matter is finally settled.

SAMUEL J. HORTON, a merchant at Hewlett's, town of Hempstead, Long Island, has brought suit against the Rev. W. W. Maguire, pastor of the Methodist church at Lawrence, for $1,000 damages, for slander. Horton was a member of Mr. Maguire's church and treasurer of the board of stewards. He quarreled with the pastor over a matter of $4, he claiming that the money had been paid to Mr. Maguire, who claimed that Horton's books were in error to that extent. There was a church trial, and Mr. Maguire was sustained by the jury, but Horton claimed that his side of the case had not been heard; and he and fifty others withdrew from the church and organized a Protestant Association. They are now building a church, leaving Mr. Maguire's church with a membership of thirty. Mr. Horton, in his complaint, sets up that Mr. Maguire went about the neighborhood saying that he was dishonest in his business and sold goods at short weight and short measure.

THE Freethinkers of Dunedin, New Zealand, show a great amount of activity in matters relating to education. At the recent school committee election they placed a majority on the committee, and a Freethinker headed the poll. The Otago Daily Times expresses its intense astonishment at the proof of the strength of the Freethought party in Dunedin, and its admiration at the excellence of its organization. Mr. Robert Stout at one of the election meetings drew attention to the fact that although on application any minister of religion might hav the use of the public schools for religious instruction out of school hours, only one such application had been made for one Sunday during the whole twelve months of the sittings of the committee. We should think that before long the children of Dunedin will arrive at that happy condition prophesied by Mr. Balfour for Scotch children. They will soon "be in danger of never hearing anything of the names of God and Jesus Christ."

HERR BEBEL, a Socialist, complained in the German Parliament the other day of the manner in which Socialists are treated. His colleague, Herr Fritzsche, is followed everywhere. He went into a tailor shop to order a coat, and a detective entered as soon as he went out and insisted upon the tailor's telling everything that had been said. Herr Hasselmann, another Socialist, walking in the Thier Garten, noticed a man dogging him. He tried for an hour and a half to escape, and then suddenly turned round and confronted the spy, who confessed himself and his business and showed the document authorizing him to act as he was doing. A boy of sixteen, the son of a Socialist, was ordered to attend a police office, and then, after being plied with liquor, was closely examined as to his father's conduct. Herr Bebel accused the detectives of even worse offenses. Some of them entered the houses of banished Socialists and insulted their wives and daughters. In one case a woman saved herself by seizing a broomstick and threatening to use it on the officer if he did not go away at once.

THE Jesuits of France are disheartened, and hav to all intents and purposes given up the contest against the government. Preparations are already in progress for their removal. It is known that strong efforts hav been made at Rome to induce the papal authorities to interfere, but the Pope has absolutely refused to hav anything to do with the matter. The remarkable opposition displayed by President Grevy's Cabinet toward the Jesuits is actuated by other motives than a desire to remove the members of that body from connection with the educational system of the republic. Considerable plotting has been in progress since the death of the Prince Imperial between the Jesuit leaders and the Imperialists, and there are good grounds for a rumor current here that an attempt was to be made at the first opportunity to re establish the empire, with a younger scion of the Bonapartes in the seat of the Little Corporal. The tendency to conspiracy always characterizing the Jesuits gives credence to the report that they were assisting in this movement, and the young republic has simply nipped the conspiracy in the bud.

THE Jesuits are to be invited by the French government to leave France. It will be a good riddance to the republic. In age, France is only an infant among republics, but she realizes the danger of such a society to her freedom. That danger has not yet been realized by us, but it is not far off. Societies to enforce this, to prevent that, and to suppress something else are springing up all over the country. On pretense of punishing crime and eradicating immorality, they aim at the suppression of anti-religious sentiment and to compel the union of church and state. In this they resemble the Jesuits, and that resemblance is continued in the means each employs. In the Legislature, in executive office, upon the bench, in the jury panel, on the witness stand, in prosecutor's chairs, and upon the police force, they hav their agents, and thus it is they subvert popular government. As the Jesuits are to priest-ridden France, so are the Comstocks, and Crosbys, and Whitneys, and Garrys to America. The good they profess and perform for a cloak far from compensates for the evil they aim to accomplish.—Truth.

THERE is a breeze among the Presbyterians of Covington, Ky. The Rev. F. D. Moore, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, has been preaching two remarkable sermons in regard to the Lord's day. He affirmed that the observance of the day, as required by the standards of the Presbyterian church, is not according to scripture, but according to the mind of the Westminster Assembly, which formulated the standards. He says he does not believe in the gloom and melancholy which are too often enforced on the day of rest. In one of his sermons he remarks: "I shall take my pleasure and comfort as I did on this Sunday, and as I propose to do next Sunday, and every succeeding Sunday, and my children shall do so, and indulge in innocent and pleasant amusements, and I think I will hav kept the Sabbath day properly. Should any of you think differently, pursue your own course, but act consistently." The promulgation of these views by Mr. Moore has made a stir in Covington, and in the Presbytery to which he and his church belong. It is semi-officially announced that the Presbytery will at its next meeting repudiate Mr. Moore's views and discipline him for holding them. Mr. Moore is a distinguished man, and the son of the Rev. T. V. Moore, D.D., who was pastor of a large church in Richmond, and afterwards of one in Nashville.

RELIGION has sometime a very funny side. In many of the churches of Bavaria the traveler may hav noticed images of the Virgin Mary which are perfectly black, and wondered what the apparent anomaly meant. It is to be accounted for in this wise: The little church at Epselheim was one night entirely consumed by fire. The villagers gathered about the huge heap of ashes the next morning, and while plying their shovels to discover if any of the treasures or relics of the church remained undestroyed they came across an image of the Virgin in a perfect state of preservation. Everything else was consumed, and to prove that this also would hav been consumed unless a miracle had been performed it was seen that it had been in the midst of the hottest flames by its color. It was thoroughly charred, and yet every feature and every limb was perfect. The news spread far and wide, and such was the enthusiasm that a new and more beautiful edifice was reared on the site of the old, in which this blackened Virgin held the most conspicuous place. Wonderful stories of marvelous cures which resulted from prayers offered to her circulated throughout the country, and she was surrounded by tokens of gratitude sent from near and far. Costly jewels, diamonds, and pearls were among the gifts of the wealthy. When the rough and sturdy Frederick the Great encamped with his army in that section of the country one of his soldiers went into the chapel, and, being too strongly tempted, quietly put into his pocket a large diamond and a still larger pearl. When arrested he freely acknowledged the offense, but defended himself by saying that the Virgin had voluntarily given them to him. He was kneeling to her, he declared, and after telling her that his wife and children at home were in great suffering he asked her if she would giv him that pearl and diamond, and she deliberately nodded her head in acquiescence, whereupon he took the gems. The priests declared the story to be false, and the matter came before Frederick for adjudication. He at once asked the priests if it were true that the Black Virgin had performed the miracles which had been attributed to her. Of course they were compelled to answer in the affirmative. "And has she ever really nodded her head in answer to the prayers of her votaries?" he continued. The answer was again in the affirmative, for if it had been denied the wonder-working power of the Virgin would hav been lost. "Then," said Frederick, "how do you know that she did not nod her head when this poor soldier asked for a paltry diamond and pearl?" and the soldier was dismissed. Even Catholic Bavaria laughs at the story and sees its funny side.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE 19TH CENTURY.

QUEEN VASHTI AND ESTHER.

The book of Esther, in which is recorded the lives of an ungodly and a godly queen, is confessedly anonymous.

We cannot see why it is placed among the canonical books (unless for the purpose of showing the providential preservation of the Jews, without whom the world could have had no savior), as God, the Lord, Jehovah, or the devil is not once mentioned in its ten chapters.

The book of Esther, as reviewed by Jasper Griggs and published by the Independent Tract Society, Worcester, Mass., is so excellent and to the point that we trust our readers will not be disappointed if, instead of our own composition, we substitute that portion of his lecture which includes our subject, and then proceed as usual, beginning on page four of his pamphlet:

"In the year 518 before Christ, commenced the reign of Ahasuerus, a very small hero in his way, but through whose influence and by whose sanction many extraordinary deeds were done, and many atrocities committed. He was a king reigning over a vast region, extending from India to Ethiopia, and including a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. Marian Evans, in her translation of Feuerbach, says something to the effect that Christianity was a religion of gormands, as throughout the Bible there is a continual record of feasting and jollity. Even the Lord himself was once entertained at dinner by Abraham.

"Accordingly the book of Esther opens with an account of a great feast given by the king, in the third year of his reign, to all his princes and his servants—the power of Persia and of Media, the nobles and the princes before him. This carouse lasted one hundred and four-score days, during which time he showed the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honors of his excellent majesty. Not content with the first feast, at the end of this time he commenced again, and made a feast unto all the people that were in Shushan, the palace, both unto great and small, seven days in the garden of the palace. The number seven is frequently used in this book, and it is a favorite number with Bible writers, and no doubt accounts for the fact that the whole book is in a state of 'sixes and sevens!' A minute account is given of the upholstery of the apartments, and of the metal of which the drinking-cups were made.

"There was royal wine in abundance, and the drinking was according to law; that is, every man was to do according to his pleasure, and no doubt many of them took more than was good for them; for the king himself set the example. Also, Vashti, the queen, made a feast for the women in the royal house.

"Now Vashti is the only woman in the book who displays any virtues or qualities worthy of admiration; but her virtues, which should have been her glory and protection, were her ruin, and the treatment she received cannot be justified in modern times upon any principle of justice or morality. On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine (in plain English, when he was intoxicated), he commanded his seven chamberlains to bring Vashti, the queen, before him with the crown royal, to show the people and the princes her beauty, for she was fair to look on. But, like a modest and sedate woman, she refused to present herself to the rude gaze of the king and his court. Therefore the king was very wroth, and his anger burned within him. He at once went to law about the matter, consulting the wise men who understood the law, also the seven princes of Persia and Media, among whom was one Memucan. The king asked what should be done with Vashti for disobeying his orders, for he seemed terribly afraid of a disobedient wife. Memucan answered and said, 'The queen hath not done wrong to the king only, but also to all the princes and to all the people that are in all the provinces, when it should become known, for the wives would despise their husbands, if they should learn that the king had allowed the queen to disobey his commands without rebuke.' This noble prince ended his address for the prosecution by the following suggestion: 'If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes, that it be not altered, that Vashti come no more before King Ahasuerus, and let the king give her royal estate unto another that is better than she. And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published throughout all his empire, (for it is great), all the wives shall give to their husbands honor, both to great and small.' The queen was never called upon to offer an explanation or justification of her conduct. (This must be the part of the Holy Writ which Plymouth church copied her by-laws from,) There was no speech for the defense, and the king, who sat as Judge Ordinary, decided on his own case, and immediately pronounced a decree condemning the respondent in all costs. And thus poor Vashti was divorced and disgraced for possessing a virtue universally admired among enlightened and refined people.

"Now, if there be any meaning at all to this disgraceful transaction, and of course there must be a meaning of deep import in every word of the sacred book—for do not preachers and commentators weave wonderful discourses out of half lines and incomplete sentences, showing what the inspired penman meant to say, and even what Deity himself was thinking about, but which unfortunately the text itself in its entirety furnishes no clue to?—now, if there is any meaning in this disgraceful divorcement of Queen Vashti, it is that women are to be subject to their husbands in all things, whether personal liberty be endangered or their moral sense outraged or not. The translators have called it 'the decree of men's sovereignty.' It is a translation, nevertheless, in which all the honor attaches to the queen, who was punished, and the odium to the king, who is praised for this deed. It is continually so with Bible morality—the good is put as the bad and the bad as the good. But, happily for humanity, it is rapidly outgrowing such misleading teaching. And out of this questionable transaction arises all the blood and murder recorded in this delectable book. If any good is supposed to have accrued to the world from the doings of Mordecai and Esther, the Lord does indeed work in mysterious ways. After the decree had gone forth the king cooled down, and when he became sober he thought of Vashti and how harsh he had been to her; but those who had counseled her banishment, not wishing him to relent, lest their own wives might expect to be forgiven after having been condemned, suggested that all officers in all provinces should be commissioned with the very agreeable task of collecting together all the pretty girls they could find and bring them to Shushan for the king to choose one from, who should be queen instead of Vashti. This idea pleased him, and he ordered it to be done. Now, as the kingdom consisted of one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, when all the pretty girls were collected together, the bevy of beauties at Shushan must have been the finest ever seen at one exhibition. But notwithstanding all these charms and counter-charms, the king was really unable to make a choice. The wonder is that the poor man was not so overpowered that he resolved to keep the whole of them. However, it took nearly four years to make up his mind. His choice ultimately fell upon Esther, the lady whose name furnishes the title to the sacred book in which her career is recorded. She had seven maidens to wait upon her, and she was chosen in the seventh year of the reign of the king.

"Esther was an orphan and a Jewess, but this latter fact was carefully concealed from the king by order of Mordecai, the 'nursing father' of Esther (as he is called), as fine a specimen of the cunning Hebrew as is to be found on record. The Jews at this time were in captivity—a state little better than slavery. Mordecai and Esther were first cousins, and Mordecai promptly availed himself of the opportunity of selling his interesting relative to the highest bidder, and with a sharp eye to his own interest at the same time. During the long time Esther was waiting her turn to be presented to the king, Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house to know how Esther did and what should become of her. As soon as Esther was crowned, Mordecai came forward and 'sat in the gate of the king.' It is not clear what this means; it is very much like being allowed to sit on the doorstep. While thus 'hanging about,' he overheard two of the doorkeepers express some intention of laying hands on the king. This was an opportunity sent by Providence to enable Mordecai to show his loyalty.

"He at once improved the opportunity, and told Esther, who told the king, at the same time making him understand to whom he was indebted for the information. The two conspirators were hanged, but Mordecai was not rewarded for his zeal. Haman was promoted to be chief over all the princes. All the king's servants, as in duty bound, bowed down and reverenced Haman; but Mordecai, being annoyed at being passed over, refused to bow down, notwithstanding he was spoken to about it daily. He threw off his reserve, now that his cousin was queen, and told them he belonged to the 'stiff-necked' race. This incensed Haman very much, and he resolved to be revenged, not alone on Mordecai, but upon his whole tribe. Haman told the king there was a certain people scattered abroad and despised, and dispersed among the provinces of the kingdom, whose laws were different and who did not obey the king; that it was not for the king's profit to suffer them, mildly suggesting that they should be destroyed, and offering ten thousand talents of silver into the hands of those who should have charge of the slaughter. As in the case of poor Vashti, the king, without hesitating, acquiesced, and seemed in a hurry to get that piece of business off his hands. Letters were dispatched into every province, written in all the languages of the people, and sealed with the king's seal, with orders to 'destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.'

"After this the king and Haman sat down to drink. It is the fashion with some people to praise Mordecai for his stubborn will and manly spirit in refusing to bow down to the first minister of state, as though he had done it from a wholesome contempt of the pomp and pride of court hirelings. But there is nothing in the text to warrant that interpretation; in fact, no word of explanation is vouched why he refused, except that he was a Jew, and that certainly gave him no credit in the matter, for if he objected to the pride of Haman, the Gentile, it was only with the greater pride of Mordecai, the Jew. Mordecai belonged to the 'chosen people,' and we see in our own day how people will strut and plume themselves when clothed in the garments of self-righteousness. When Mordecai heard of the sanguinary decree, of course he was very much alarmed, and—that silly and dirty trick peculiar to the favorites of the Lord—he tore his clothes and put on sackcloth and ashes. He went before the palace crying with a loud and bitter cry, but he was too dusty to be allowed to enter the king's gate. Information of Mordecai's grief was conveyed to Esther—also of the state of his wardrobe—when she immediately sent fresh garments, with orders to take away the sackcloth and ashes; but he refused, preferring his rags and dirt. Then the queen sent her chamberlain to Mordecai to know what troubled him, and how it was. He sent her a copy of the decree, together with all the particulars, with a request that she would go to the king and make supplication for her people. There was some danger attendant upon the carrying out of this request, as a law existed whereby all who came to the king into the inner court without being called should be put to death, unless the king pardoned them; and as the queen had not seen her loving husband for a month, she was afraid to go to him uncalled. This was conveyed to Mordecai, who replied: 'Think not within thyself that thou shalt escape the king's house more than all the Jews.' This determined Esther, who told Mordecai to gather all the Jews who were in town, and with them to fast three days and three nights, and she and her maid would do likewise. This species of praying for success is at best but an empty supplication. 'Mark what I tell you, the Jews never prayed but when they were in trouble, and never for anything but victory, vengeance, and riches.' But she said, 'I will go to the king, which is not according to law, and if I perish, I perish.'

"One might expect from this that Esther was filled with all noble qualities. On the contrary, she had the smoothness of the leopard, with the ferocity of the tiger. Here she resolved, at all hazards to herself, to beg for the lives of the Jews. But listen to the result of her mission. On the third day she ventured unbidden into the royal presence, and to her great relief the king was overjoyed to see her, and said: 'What wilt thou, Queen Esther? and what is thy request? It shall be given thee, even to the half of the kingdom."

"The king was a mighty man at a feast, and Esther, knowing his strong points, and also anticipating that it would be favorably received, had prepared a banquet, to which she invited him, including Haman in the invitation. Throughout Bible history it will be found that 'the pot and the platter' form either the prelude or the sequel to nearly all great undertakings. Of course the king accepted the invitation to dine out in his own house, and Haman was only too happy and proud to attend him. After the wine had gone round the king again repeated his offer, that whatever request Esther made, even to the half of his kingdom, it should be granted. She was still cautious and hesitating, not being sure that the roystering monarch was fed up to the proper pitch for the purpose; so she said if the king and Haman would come to a feast on the following day she would then make known her request. This was agreed to. Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart. But his exultation was of short duration, for he had not gone far before he nearly fell over that obstinate old Mordecai, who refused to get up or move out of his way. This filled him with indignation, but still he restrained himself till he reached home, when he sent for his friends, and Zeresh, his wife. 'And Haman told them of the glory of his riches and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him,' for he was a man of great self-importance, and was quite overpowered if he did not receive a proper amount of deference from his presumed inferiors. After recounting his wonderful position he said: 'Yet all this availeth me nothing so long as I see Mordecai, the Jew, sitting at the king's gate.' His wife and his friends told him to cheer up, and get a gallows made fifty cubits high, and at the morrow's banquet to speak unto the king that Mordecai might be hanged thereon. This humane suggestion pleased Haman much, and, like a modern Governor Eyre, he thereupon issued his order for the erection of that neat piece of architecture—an instrument still used in this country to finish the education which the priest begins. It so happened, and very fortunately so for Mordecai, that the night before his second banquet the king was not able to sleep, so he thought he would read awhile, and therefore ordered the book of records to be brought, and in this he found chronicled the name and services of Mordecai, informing him of the two door-keepers who had got up a little conspiracy against himself. The king asked what honor and dignity had been done to Mordecai for this. He was told, 'Nothing.' He exclaimed, 'Who is in the court?' He was answered, 'Haman.' Now, Haman, unfortunately for himself, had gone there post-haste, not waiting till the morning, to crave the boon of being allowed to elevate poor Mordecai fifty cubits high. It was an ominous moment for him. He was ordered into the king's presence, who, not giving him time to speak, asked what should be done unto the man whom the king delighted to honor. Now, Haman thought in his heart to whom would the king delight to do honor more than himself. He therefore resolved not to underdo the matter, and modestly proposed that the happy individual should be decked out in royal apparel, the crown put upon his head, the whole mounted upon the king's horse and led through the streets of the city by one of the oldest princes, and to be proclaimed before him, 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor.' But what was Haman's utter astonishment when he was told to make haste and do all he had said to Mordecai, the Jew, the man whom he hated above all other men! But this was not the first time in which Haman was destined to be caught in his own trap. He hurried home, hiding his head, and told his wife and friends of his disappointment. He was a fallen minister, and they all felt that Mordecai—the Benjamin Disraeli of his time—would lead the opposition to the Treasury benches. And while they were talking, the messenger came to summon Haman to the second banquet which Esther had prepared. But he was in no mood for eating. He had not yet digested the bitter pill of Mordecai's advancement. The king again asked Esther what boon she craved.

"She said: 'Let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request. For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish.' Though five years had elapsed since their marriage, this appears to have been the first intimation the king had that his wife was a Jewess. He asked in his heart, 'Who is he and where is he that durst presume in his heart to do so?'

"The king had forgotten all about his decree [he was drunk] he had made and signed with his own ring, for the utter destruction of the people who were scattered throughout all his provinces. This was too small a matter to dwell upon his memory. Esther answered and said, 'The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.' The king rushed into the garden in great fury, and while he was gone Haman became much alarmed for his safety; and when the king returned he found Haman on his knees beseeching Esther to intercede with the king in his behalf. The king mistook the meaning of the supplication, and became jealous as well as angry. This sealed the fate of poor Haman, who was immediately seized and his face covered.

"An obliging chamberlain who was standing by, with the usual readiness of court sycophants to help a fallen favorite, told the king that Haman had got a gallows already erected, which was intended for Mordecai, the rising minister. Upon that hint the king spake and told them to hang Haman thereon. 'So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai.' Then was the king's wrath pacified. Thus Haman was the architect of his own fortune, and ultimately graced his own structure. But the king was not blameless in the matter; he was more to blame than Haman himself, for he signed a sanguinary decree at the first time of asking, and without making the slightest inquiry into what he was about to do.

"Yes, this is the man into whose hands God had committed the care of a portion of his 'chosen people.' This justifies the saying that Christianity is much indebted for its preservation to the vilest and silliest characters in all ages and countries. The king, as is the wont of monarchs, bestowed the dead man's property upon his favorites, and Esther became enriched by Haman's death. Mordecai also experienced rapid promotion, as he was for the first time introduced to the king as Esther's relative. And the king took off his ring, which he had taken off from Haman, and gave it unto Mordecai, and Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman. The Jews' star was now in the ascendant. The queen then besought the king to revoke his edict against the Jews, which had been issued at the instigation of Haman. Being a most yielding man, and having the amiable weakness of granting everything to everybody at the moment of asking, whether it was the slaughter of a whole race or the hanging of an individual, even on his own new gallows, he consented without a murmur, to reverse what he had done a short time before, and commanded Mordecai, saying, 'Write ye also for the Jews, as it liketh you, in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring; for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse.' Mordecai's patience and perseverance were at length rewarded and his day of triumph had arrived. Having obtained permission from the king, he availed himself of it to the fullest extent. He sent proclamation into all the provinces, in which he said, 'The king has granted the Jews in every city to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.' Not content with telling the Jews they might destroy, slay, and cause to perish all who assaulted them, he ordered them all to be in readiness on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month to avenge themselves on their enemies. Mordecai then strutted out before the people like a peacock, to show his fine feathers. He went out in royal apparel of blue and white, and a great crown of gold, and with garments of fine linen and purple; and the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad. The Jews had light and gladness and joy and honor. And in every province, and in every city withersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, the Jews had joy and gladness, a feast, and a good day. And many of the people of the land became Jews [that is, took out naturalization papers]; for the fear of the Jews fell upon them. Accordingly, on the fatal thirteenth of the twelfth month, the day on which the Jews were to have been killed, the order of things was reversed, for the Jews gathered themselves together in all the cities to lay hands on such as sought their hurt; and no man could withstand them, for the fear of them fell upon all people. All the king's officials throughout the kingdom, like true time-servers and worshipers of power, because the prime minister was a Jew, joined with Jews against their own countrymen; and thus as bloody a tragedy was enacted in Asia in the year 509 B. C., as that which took place in France on the 2d day of December, 1,851 years after this precious gospel came to bless mankind.

"Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter and destruction, and did what they would unto those that hated them. And in Shushan, the palace, the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men. 'The ten sons of Haman slew they,' thus carrying out the barbarous doctrine taught in this holy book, of visiting the sins of the father upon the children. 'On that day the number of those that were slain in Shushan were brought before the king; and the king said unto Esther the queen, The Jews have slain and destroyed five hundred men in Shushan the palace, and the ten sons of Haman; what have they done in the rest of the king's provinces? [They have butchered only seventy-four thousand two hundred innocent men, women, and children.] Now, what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee? Or what is thy request further, and it shall be done.' Mark the fiendish answer of this tigress, sent of course by God to be an instrument for the preservation of his favorite people. 'Then said Esther, If it please the king, let it be granted to the Jews that are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's decree, and let Haman's ten sons be hanged upon the gallows. And the king commanded it so to be done; and the decree was given at Shushan, and they hanged Haman's ten sons.' This was diabolical ferocity, prompted by the direst spirit of revenge. Esther could not have forgotten that a few moments before the king had told her that the ten sons of Haman had been slain, and therefore to hang them on the gallows was not with the idea of killing them the second time, but merely for the gratification of gloating over the ghastly corpses of ten men who had never injured her, but who had the misfortune to be the sons of her enemy. This is Bible morality, of which there are innumerable instances in this sacred word of God. [Oh! oh!!]

"After this the Jews fell to feasting and rejoicing and called it a day of gladness, and resolved, at the suggestion of Mordecai, to celebrate both the thirteenth and fourteenth of the twelfth month as a festival every year. 'The leaves of the book of their rejoicing are dead men's skins printed in human blood and paged in pillage; it is illuminated with tears and broken hearts.' Then Esther, the queen, and Mordecai, the Jew, wrote with all authority to confirm this, and sent letters unto all the Jews in the one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, with words of peace and truth. 'For Mordecai, the Jew, was next unto King Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, speaking peace to all his seed.' And thus ends this eventful history.

"We close this blood-stained Book of Esther with feelings of loathing and disgust. There is not one principle of morality inculcated throughout the entire narrative; there is but one estimable or worthy character depicted therein, and she is a victim; the incidents recorded are incidents of drunkenness, domestic tyranny, lust, ambition, vacillation, revenge, and wholesale and brutal murder of innocent men, women, and children. There is no inspiration, no instruction, no elevation in it. It is one dull, dead level of brutality and animal indulgence.

"The first chapter commences with a gross outrage upon the delicacies of a sensitive woman, and ends by her being divorced and disgraced, that 'men's sovereignty' may be upheld and proclaimed. This can be quoted as an argument in favor of the oppression of the human race, for does it not tally with the other passages in the Bible which say that the woman shall be subject unto the man?

"Chapter second enters into the particulars of the utterly immoral way in which the king chose a wife in succession to Vashti, and the calculating manner in which Mordecai brought his foster-daughter to the market and sold her to the highest bidder.

"Chapter third is an account of an ambitious minister, who, on being irritated and annoyed by a man belonging to a despised race, who presumed upon his relation to the queen, seeks to have his enemy's race destroyed; and where a king, who should be the guardian of his people, condemns to death a large number of his subjects at the mere request of one man.

"Chapter fourth depicts the real cause of this mischief and commotion in a state of abject fear. There is no reason why Mordecai should have hated and annoyed Haman, unless it was from a feeling of envy at his elevation and good fortune.

"Chapter fifth shows a man so engrossed with a feeling of hatred that he builds a gallows of his own on which to hang his enemy.

"Chapter sixth pretends to relate how a king can honor a subject who has served him; but the story is so overdone that it becomes outrageously improbable.

"Chapter seventh is an attempt to portray an instance of retributive justice, but it is a failure, for the wicked Haman, who dies on his own gallows, is not hanged for seeking the lives of the Jews, but because the king, in his mad fury, mistook the meaning of his subject's supplication.

"Chapter eighth shows a vacillating and sanguinary tyrant playing with the lives of his subjects at the merest caprice, sparing neither women nor little innocent children.

"Chapter ninth contains an account of deeds worthy only of fiends, the bare recital of which makes one shudder, but over which God's chosen cannibals rejoice and make merry and call it a good day, which they will celebrate through all coming time. And Esther, the heroine of the book, God's appointed agent to save his peculiar people, when told of the glorious slaughter which her brethren had had the first day, begged the boon of one more day of the hellish work, that the agony might be prolonged; that more wives might be made widows; that there should be more children made orphans; that the desolation might be more widespread, and that the wail of despair might again resound through the affrighted city.

"And chapter tenth closes the book with pompous parade of Mordecai's greatness in the eyes of the multitude and his 'seeking the wealth of his people and speaking peace to all his seed.'

"Was anything ever more monstrous than this? If what is recorded of the Jews in the Bible be true, they are as vile a race as ever trod the earth. And this book is read in Sunday-schools, and these are the lessons implanted in the young and tender minds of children. From their earliest moments they are taught to reverence this volume as the sacred word of God, and not to doubt or call in question, on pain of eternal, never-ending torments, a single line or word therein. What does Theodore Parker say on this point? 'To the Bible the minister prostitutes his mind and conscience, heart and soul; on the authority of an anonymous Hebrew book he will justify the slaughter of innocent men, women, and children by the thousand; and on that of an anonymous Greek book he will believe, or at least command others to believe, that man is born totally depraved and God will perpetually slaughter men in hell by the million though they had committed no fault except that of not believing an absurd doctrine they had never heard of. Ministers take the Bible in a lump as divine; all between the lids of the book is equally the "word of God," infallible, and miraculous. "He that believeth it shall be saved, and he that believeth it not shall be damned." No amount of piety and morality can make up for not believing this.'

Did He Rise?

In a recent discourse on the "Resurrection," Rev. John Chadwick said:

The four gospels are our principal authorities. The resurrection of Jesus is related in each one of these with more or less detail. Matthew represents Mary Magdalene and the other Mary as going on Saturday evening to the sepulcher. Mark represents these and Salome as going early Sunday morning, "after the rising of the sun." Luke increases the number of women and fixes the time before sunrise, and John represents Mary Magdalene as coming alone, "early, while it was yet dark." Here, to begin with, is a certain amount of inconsistency, and, other things being equal, that one or more women, at some time or other, went to the sepulcher would be all we could infer. According to Matthew, in the presence of Magdalene and the other Mary, there was a great earthquake caused by an angel who came and rolled away the stone of the sepulcher and sat on it, "and for fear of him the keepers did shake and become as dead men. And the angel said unto the women, Fear ye not, for I know that ye seek Jesus, who hath been crucified. He is not here, for he is raised as he said," etc. Here you will notice that there is no claim that anyone witnessed the resurrection. The guard do not see it, nor the women. The angel informs them that it has already taken place. Again, this account, if true, would preclude the appearance of the risen Jesus to any one in Jerusalem. That God should send an angel to hasten the disciples to Galilee to meet Jesus there, and that afterward they should see him in Jerusalem, gives God the appearance of a person who does not know his own mind, or the angel the appearance of not being well informed. This story must hav been first current when an appearance in Jerusalem was no part of the tradition. But, from beginning to end, the story is a tissue of improbabilities, to use no stronger word. We hav an angel with his appearance like lightning, and his raiment white as snow. Now, an angel in a story is as sure proof that the story is a legend as a trout in the milk that the milk has suffered from adulteration. The angel causes an earthquake. A very little knowledge of the nature of an earthquake is sufficient to discredit this one mentioned only by Matthew, among whose properties earthquakes particularly abound. He introduces one at the moment of Jesus' death, in the course of which "the graves were opened and many of the bodies of the saints which slept arose" and went into Jerusalem, and were seen by many. But the other gospels do not mention any such occurrence, although it is sufficiently impressive for a passing word. The guard at the tomb is another trait peculiar to the first gospel. It was evidently placed there ideally to rebut any charge that the body of Jesus was secretly removed by his disciples, not actually to prevent such removal. That Pilate would detail a Roman guard for such a purpose is incredible; that the guard to please the Sanhedrim would risk their lives by confessing they fell asleep is unspeakably absurd. The account in Matthew also suggests the question, What was the need of an earthquake to roll away the stone of the sepulcher when Jesus had already risen? for it is so represented.

Let us now consider the account of the resurrection in the second gospel. It is that after sunrise, Sunday morning, Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of James and Salome, went with spices to embalm the body of Jesus, and found the stone of the sepulcher rolled away, and entering saw a young man sitting on the right side in a long, white garment, who spoke in terms very similar to those of the angel in Matthew. Here are several divergencies from the account in Matthew. There, an earthquake; here, none. There, the stone rolled away after the arrival of the women; here, before. There, the angel sitting on the stone; here, in the sepulcher. There, they go and tell the disciples; here, in flagrant disobedience to the angelic command, they tell no one. And with the assertion that they told no one the second gospel properly ends; for the concluding verses (9–20) are not found in the early MSS. These verses evidently embody an independent legend, more nearly allied to that of the fourth gospel than to the others.

The account in Luke is different in several particulars from that of Matthew and Mark. It agrees with Mark in finding the stone removed. It adds Joanna to the two women of Matthew where Mark adds Salome, and it adds other women who are not specified. In place of the angel on the stone in Matthew, and the "young man" in the sepulcher in Mark, we hav here two men in shining garments, who remind the women that Jesus had promised to rise again on the third day. And they remembered his words. As if they could hav forgotten them if he had ever spoken such! The women go and tell the eleven all these things. And these words appeared to them an idle tale and they believed them not. Strange, if Jesus had indeed, as the synoptists tell, again and again foretold to them this resurrection. It is not claimed here any more than in Matthew or Mark that any one saw the resurrection. Perhaps the most important difference is that Galilee is no longer specified, as in Matthew and Mark, as the place where Jesus will show himself to his disciples. The bearing of this difference will be hereafter apparent.

So far in these lectures I hav made no use of the fourth gospel, for reasons given in my first lecture. It is a production of the second century, and not like the synoptics, the result of traditional conglomeration, but a dogmatic treatise, in which everything is made to serve the preconceived idea that Jesus was the Logos. But in its treatment of the resurrection it has the appearance of representing a more developed form of the legend. Mary Magdalene goes to the sepulcher alone and finds the stone rolled away. She runs and finds Peter and John, and these two run to the sepulcher and find it empty. Not knowing the scriptures, that Jesus must rise from the dead, they go to their own homes. Strange again, if Jesus had foretold his resurrection so frequently. Here again there is no claim that any one saw the resurrection. The disciples went to their own homes without any idea that such a thing had taken place. But when they had gone home, Mary Magdalene, whom they had left weeping at the mouth of the tomb, looks in and sees two angels sitting, one at the head, the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus lay, though a minute before the disciples had seen nothing but the grave clothes. Then she sees Jesus, whom at first she mistakes for the gardener, and goes and tells the disciples that she has seen him. Here again there is no mention of Galilee, nor any promise of meeting the disciples anywhere—rather an implication that he will not do so. That various meetings are narrated further on points to the fact that the account in the fourth gospel is an incongruous jumble of various legends.

And now let us consider the different statements in regard to the appearance of Jesus to different persons after his resurrection. One of the most interesting of these statements is that relating to "the walk to Emmaus." This statement is in Luke. Two disciples—none of the twelve—were walking toward Emmaus, a village seven or eight miles from Jerusalem. They are joined by a person whom they do not recognize, who expounds to them the scriptures concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus. Afterward, while eating with them, he takes bread, breaks it, and gives thanks. Then they recognize Jesus, and he vanishes from their sight. Beautiful as it is, the legendary character of this story should be apparent to the dullest sense.

No such village as Emmaus can be identified within seven or eight miles from Jerusalem. A village of similar name in Galilee suggests that this account orignally belonged to the circle of tradition which represented Jesus as first appearing to his disciples in Galilee.

We hav here a Jesus who is not recognized, although he is corporeal enough to eat food, while he is at the same time a phantom who appears and vanishes like a Haneric deity. It is said that the disciples, returning to Jerusalem, found the eleven, and were told that Jesus "was raised, and was seen by Simon." Of this appearance there is no other mention, and the statement by itself can hav no evidential value. The two from Emmaus are still talking with the eleven, when Jesus stands in their midst. They are affrighted and think they see a spirit. But he bids them handle him, telling them "a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me having." Then he appeases his hunger with broiled fish and honeycomb. Enjoining on them to remain in Jerusalem he leads them out toward Bethany, and while in the act of blessing them he is taken again to heaven. Here again we hav a person who is by turns a phantom and a substantial personality. This statement you will see precludes any appearance in Galilee and fixes the occasion on the day of the resurrection. The account in John is evidently a developed form of this in Luke. On the day of the resurrection the disciples are sitting with fastened doors when suddenly Jesus appears among them and proceeds to offer evidence of his corporeality. Eight days later he appears again to confirm the faith of Thomas, who must feel the nail prints and put his hand into his wounded side before he can believe. The divergence of this account from that of Luke is palpable enough. In Luke the ascension is on the day of the resurrection. Here Jesus is corporeally present eight days later—corporeal and yet capable of "appearing" in a room whose doors were fastened. Subsequent appearances of Jesus are represented in the last chapter of John, but this chapter formed no part of the original gospel. Still it is interesting as showing how the legend grew more and more grossly extravagant as time went on.

Returning to the first gospel, we find there an account of an appearance of Jesus to his disciples in Galilee. The undoubted force of this tradition is that Jesus had not appeared in Jerusalem and did not appear afterward. Of the ascension there is no account whatever.

And now a word in regard to the ascension. Matthew does not mention it, and Mark is equally silent. But in the appendix to this gospel it is said that "he was taken up into heaven and sat on the right hand of God." John again is silent. So then we hav three gospels out of four making no final disposition of the risen Jesus. Had he come to life only to die again, and that immediately—the death of ordinary men? Why no mention of this? Did he remain living for some time longer? Had he then become so insignificant that he deserved no further mention? Matthew, Mark, and John leave us entirely in the dark concerning all these things. But Luke is the gospel of the occasion. And, as we hav seen, he fixes this on the day of the resurrection. But the author of Luke is also the author of Acts.

In Acts also there is an account of the ascension. But here it is said that it was not till forty days after the resurrection. When a writer contradicts himself in this astonishing fashion, what reliance can we place in anything he says? And yet Luke wrote his gospel, as he tells us, after many had taken in hand a similar task, and tells us that it is a record of the things that were most certainly believed "among the early Christians." How certainly we may judge from the fact that ten years later, writing the book of Acts, he changes the ascension from the first day to the fortieth after the resurrection. Could we hav any better evidence of the unreliableness of the tradition, or of the absolutely uncritical nature of the evangelist's method of research? When a writer contradicts himself in this fashion without a word of apology or explanation, what contradictions may we not expect from different writers, and what a quicksand must be the entire New Testament's account of both resurrection and ascension?

Having received the testimony of the gospels to the resurrection, in almost every particular, what is the net result? Do we find that this testimony is much more complete and satisfactory than the testimony which we require for any ordinary event as the resurrection is more remarkable and unusual than any ordinary event? Hav we fifteen or twenty billion times as much evidence as we hav for Jesus' death? On the contrary, we hav not so much. This was in the course of nature. All the accounts agree concerning the manner of it. But here no single account is self-consistent or agrees with any other. The different accounts are self-destructive and mutually so. They agree in hardly a single particular. They differ in particulars of the first importance. Here the appearance of the risen Jesus is placed in Galilee; then in direct contravention of his own assertions, in Jerusalem.

But we are told that where there is so much smoke there must be some fire; that where there is so much belief, something happened, something must hav happened, if not the physical resurrection, then something else. Agreed, and still the something that occurred may hav been a very modest something which gradually, through various processes of accretion, attained to a considerable bulk. It is not necessary to suppose that the tradition of the New Testament was the result of any one event. Different parts of it we can trace to different sources. One part is the reflection of the Old Testament texts; another of actual sayings of Jesus sadly misunderstood; another of unconscious exaggeration; another of the more or less conscious endeavor to harmonize incongruous elements. Beside all these sources of the tradition was there something more? I am inclined to answer, Yes. What was it? Many hav said it was the resurrection of Jesus from apparent death, and they hav argued their case with a great deal of ingenuity. Even our dear friend, Dr. Furniss, is inclined to this idea in its most poetic form. Of course such a resuscitation would hav no theological significance. It would be no crowning miracle at all. It would neither vindicate the Messianic idea of Jesus nor our personal immortality. Still, if it were a fact it would be worth while to know it, painful and barren as it would be. But the evidence for such a fact, though it would be the immediate inference from any certainty that Jesus was seen alive after his burial, is wholly insufficient. What is infinitely more likely is that there was some visionary experience arising from the intensely excited condition of the disciples' minds after the death of their great teacher.

Further illustrating this point, Mr. Chadwick then continued: The indications are that the original tradition embodied the Galilean appearance; that all the rest is subsequent accretion and embellishment. The indications also are that the original tradition did not include any stay upon the earth, if any physical resurrection. It was the glorified Jesus who was seen. So in the original tradition there was no ascension. The resurrection and ascension were one and the same thing. This is Paul's thought as well. Though he has much to say about the resurrection, he has not a word concerning any ascension or any period of physical life upon the earth after the resurrection.

The speaker concluded: There was another burial of Jesus than that in the rock-hewn sepulcher; it was in a tomb where thousands were already buried, buried alive under the forms and ceremonies of an effete religion. And from this burial there was, indeed, no resurrection. It was an ideal resurrection.

Spiritualism and Materialism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: To strangers like myself in the literary and scientific field, the pro and con of Spiritualism and Materialism are more or less problematical, hence the disposition to solve them within or without the bounds of physical demonstration is becoming more generally manifest. Friends on the right, friends on the left, cause me to throw in the face of your more cultured correspondents the following inquiries contained in a letter by a lady to me, which sounds like truth seeking. She says: "I hav acquaintances that call themselves Spiritualists, who are more Materialistic than I myself can be. I hav read The Truth Seeker you sent me, and if I knew the difference between the two characteristic writers thereof doubtless it would be most adapted to my faculties that seek wisdom and understanding of truth, but whereas, now they seem to start out together from the same standpoint, I am led to admire them equally, while evidently there should be a choice. I wish you to favor me with a line of discrimination between the incomparable twain.

"Yours in the bonds of truth, Minerva."

Answering according to my understanding, I made the following statements, viz., that Spiritualists believed the invisible spirit to be the man, and that Materialists believed the outward visible body to be the man, hence the one is a livionist, the other an oblivionist. In conclusion, I observe the same difference existed between the two first perfect symbols recorded of the history of progressive man, Adam and Eve, since which time traces of the two forces, negative and positive, are clearly to be seen in all generations, thus the great events including births, deaths, etc., in families and nations is now, and ever shall be a repetition of biblical history, without its pervertion, and that theologians, regardless of the law of the universe, hav so materialized the force thereof that we are now bordering on a preadamic state, hoping and waiting for a clear manifestation of the evolving forces which will create anew both heaven and earth.

A Card from Mr. Dodd to Mrs. Slenker.

MRS. E. D. SLENKER: The New York Observer suggests: "The proceeds of Robert Ingersoll's lecture on Paine ($1,500) are to be applied to the erection of a monument to the memory of the author of the 'Age of Reason.' We submit the following as a just and appropriate epitaph:

"To the memory of
The man of whom John Adams,
President of the United States,
Recorded this opinion:
'Worthless, unprincipled, profligate,
Blackguard Paine;'
The man who wrote a letter to
GEORGE WASHINGTON,
And thus addressed the Father of his Country:
'Treacherous in private friendship and a hypocrite in public life, the world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an impostor.'"

Friend, how do you like this opinion of Thomas Paine? Look at his expression to Washington. I hav no confidence in Paine, and about as little in Colonel Ingersoll. I do not believe either to be honest, and hav good reason for it; and B. F. Underwood is, I think, no better. Underwood said at Leesville, Ohio (one who heard told me), that he would not advise anyone to believe as he, but he lectured to make money. Ingersoll chokes, jokes, and sneers at the ravages of Christianity and charges $200 a night for one lecture, while he knows men too poor to buy their wives decent clothes pay him $1 to hear him mock the Savior and blaspheme God Almighty. We must all giv an account in the day of judgment. Be warned! J. H. DODD.

REPLY TO THE CARD OF J. H. DODD.—PART I.

If John Adams did call Mr. Paine by those slanderous epithets, it is no proof they were deserved by him. Adams was one of Paine's warmest friends and greatest admirers, and said, "Even Washington's sword would hav been wielded in vain if not supported by the pen of Paine." I think, considering the light of the age, it is about time Christians stopped repeating old scurrilous epithets and tales about so good a man as Thomas Paine; a man who lived an industrious, useful, and moral life, and whose sole aim was to do good to his fellow-men. He gave to the world grand and noble truths, many of which it is not even yet prepared to receive.

It makes a great deal of difference "whose ox is gored" in a religious controversy as well as in any other, and the "myth-mongering sky-pilots," fretting and fuming over the hard rubs Freethinkers are giving to their God, Christ, and Ghost, think nothing can be too hard to say against an Infidel patriot and philosopher. They forget that these men hav friends who admire, love, respect, and honor their memory, and to whom each foul epithet is as a stinging wound from a sharp, two-edged sword. They find themselves hard up for arguments to controvert the opinions of the dead heroes they would fain disgrace, and so content themselves with desperate efforts to blacken their moral character.

"An ounce of principle is worth a ton of creeds and catechism." Paine had the principle, and his slanderers hav the creed and catechism. But if the brave old patriot was alive they would not dare to repeat these vile tales about him, for they well know his sharp, incisive, telling words would render innoxious every falsehood they could invent. And if some ignorant coward, who was too contemptible to be worthy of notice, did venture to attack his reputation, it would be because he knew the man was too great, noble, and magnanimous to seek revenge.

The priests call Infidels like Paine and Ingersoll "bad and wicked sinners," but they know as well as we do that they are not bad men. They know that if Infidels were bad, wicked, mean, and vile, they would be full of revenge and retaliation, and would turn upon the miscreants who slander their dead and living friends as well as themselves, and they would burn and destroy every church in the land, and perhaps murder every preacher. But they feel in their hearts that the men they defame and decry are really noble, true, good, charitable, and long-suffering. They know that if there is a bad, revengeful, lying, cheating, hypocrite in any place he is sure to be a church-member, and one, too, that they dare not offend, lest he seek revenge and burn and destroy their property or otherwise injure them; so they carefully cover up their sins and help to prop and boost up the sinner into a respectable position in society.

A pious, canting, psalm-singing, fulminator of foul epithets is hardly worth noticing, and I generally pass them quietly by; but there is a point when "forbearance ceases to be a virtue," and justice and truth demand aggressive warfare, and hence my reply to thy card of contumely against three great, true, honest, moral, and useful men—Paine, Ingersoll, and Underwood; and while owning that these "mighty men of renown" may hav each made a few mistakes, I will defy them to point out among dead or living Christians three noted pious preachers who hav been morally better, mentally wiser, or practically of more use to the world. There hav been more good things said about Thomas Paine during the few weeks that hav passed since the last celebration of his birthday than were said about your hybrid man-god, Christ Jesus, for five hundred years after his reputed birthday. Christians seem to hav a hereditary mania for calling foul names when they attack Infidels. While we think your Jesus had many very objectionable qualities, we do not call him a "worthless, unprincipled, profligate, and blackguard," nor should we hav ever cared to take issue with his doctrines had he not been held up as a god and savior, and a perfect leader and true guide. As it is we are compelled to show that he is only mortal and fallible, though we do giv him credit for many wise and good utterances, while we deny that he originated them. But in speaking of our guides and leaders, Christians seem to feel that the English language is too poor to furnish them with sufficiently strong and opprobrious epithets with which to denounce them. Whenever some pious fanatic runs over with holy zeal for the good of the church, and wants to create a sensation, and spit out some of the sentiments of the 109th psalm (and no popish bull of excommunication ever exceeded in heinous virulence this delectable bit of "inspired" malignity), he generally selects for his text some Infidel, or Infidels in general, and sails in regardless of truth, fact, or reason. It is so easy to fight imaginary enemies; they will never strike back, you know; they are not able to contradict or show up the false malignity of the accusation. Safe in the "coward's castle" (the pulpit or the newspaper), the Christian goes on age after age mouthing over the old slanders and inventing new ones till the world sickens at the nauseous draught, and longs for something purer, higher, and more ennobling. It is coming, too, on wings of the wind from the North and the South, the East and the West. Hark to the joyful strains from thousands and hundreds of thousands of ransomed minds freed from superstition's thrall! National Liberal Leagues are springing up by the hundreds all over our broad land, and each League will soon hav its organ through which to voice its thrilling utterances to the world. The total separation of church and state will place the great mogul of Christian belief on a perfect level (so far as the law is concerned) with the petty chieftain of the followers of Mumbo Jumbo. "Equal rights for all!" is the watchword of the brave and the true.

"Go, chain the swift-winged flight of Time, bid fleeting moments pause,
And from the face of Nature blot the impress of her laws;
Go, picture frightful devils, or build a horrid hell,
Where angry gods in fiery hate their bitterest curses tell.
Go, change a vice to virtue, make truth and falsehood one;
Thou canst not chain a manly soul or still a manly tongue.
My scorn upon thee, coward slave! in freedom raise thy head,
The noblest truth is valueless while it remains unsaid."

REPLY TO THE DODD CARD.—PART. 2.

As to the letter Paine wrote Washington, I hav it embodied in his life and also others explanatory of the reasons why Paine used such strong language concerning the President. Few men hav the moral courage to speak the truth about a man who is in high position and enjoys the extreme of popular favor when the truth is derogatory to the character of the world's idol. Paine was an honest man and a truly conscientious one. He had labored with Washington for the freedom of America and had been one of the main instrumentalities in effecting the great revolution of public sentiment and the consequent election of Washington to the Presidency. The two men had been also warm personal friends, at least Paine felt real friendship for Washington, and the latter pretended to return the feeling, though Paine afterwards discovered what most of Washington's intimates found out, namely, that this greatly overlauded "Father of his country" was incapable of a real friendship for any one and was regarded by those who knew him best as entirely devoid of sympathetic feelings! He was cold, calculating, ambitious, and vain.

After the Revolution in America Washington remained at home receiving the adulation and homage, flattery and worship of his people, while Paine "ventured into new scenes of difficulty to extend the principles which that Revolution had produced." He preached the principles that Washington fought for here, in France, and at last, simply on the plea of being born an Englishman, he was—with all persons then in France who were of English birth—imprisoned, and he laid for long weary months in jail, and Washington made no effort to release him or to hav justice done him. There was some effort made by Congress, but as he was not decided to be an American citizen it failed. James Monroe said to Paine on that occasion, "By being with us through the Revolution you are of our country as absolutely as if you had been born there and you are no more of England than every American is." I could fill pages with the ungrateful conduct of Washington towards one who had done far more for American liberty than himself. But it is sufficient to hav shown that though the language of Paine in the quoted sentence of thy card is strong, indignant, and emphatic, it is, every word of it, merited and deserved!

Washington has been almost as greatly overrated as Paine has been underrated. The faults, imperfections, and errors of the one hav been carefully covered up by his friends and quietly tabooed by his enemies (save when justice to some standard hero demanded exposure), while the memory of the other has been systematically defamed, insulted, and maligned by every one who wished to show the evil effects of speaking plain truths about the unbelievable creeds and dogmas of superstitious beliefs. I would to-day rather hav been Thomas Paine than either John Adams or George Washington! I would sooner risk my soul's salvation (if I had one) upon the real merits of the latter than the combined virtues of both the others! Paine was a man of real heart and genuine principle. He sought not for honor, fame, power, or wealth; he only strove to do good. He looked along down through the coming ages and saw the needs of his race, and sought to prepare a way for their salvation from the tyranny of kings and the still greater tyranny of priests. Once when writing on the fall of empires and extinction of the ancient world he said:

"A thousand years hence, perhaps in less, America may be what England now is. The innocence of her character, that won the hearts of all nations in her favor, may sound like a romance, and her inimitable virtue as if it had never been. The ruins of that liberty, which thousands bled to obtain, may just furnish materials for a village tale or extort a sigh from rustic sensibility, while the fashionables of that day, enveloped in dissipation, shall deride the principle and deny the fact."

Paine wrought for ages; Washington labored for the glory of the present and the popularity of the hour. The fame of the president will be lost in the glory of the savior of the ages. If Paine felt that he owned a truth the world needed, he did not pause and hesitate and wonder if it would be politic to utter it, but he braved all and dared all and hesitated not to call even Washington an impostor when he found him recreant to honor and principle as well as the claims of friendship; and to all such time-serving hypocrites would I too say in the words of the poet:

Shame, coward! sell thy manhood for paltry sums of gold,
And, for the sake of public smiles, leave noble thoughts untold!
Must freedom veil her godly form, and virtue blush for shame,
And great thoughts kindling in the soul be silenced for a name?
None but a coward slave will bow at superstition's nod,
And leave a monstrous lie uncursed, though sanctioned by a God."

Liberalism Triumphant.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am now in the field, with my sails unfurled, and everywhere I go I find the fires of truth are kindling up. Liberalism is taking root very rapidly in Indiana. I hav found Liberals already organized in several places where I hav been. At this place they are preparing to organize. I hav received many calls to lecture from every direction, and receive many encouraging words and evidences that my lectures are highly appreciated. My vocal organs were somewhat impaired at first by a bronchial affection. But the difficulty has at last almost vanished, so that I am now able to make myself clearly understood by all.

From this place I go north to Peru, Rochester, Plymouth, and Walkerton; thence eastward to Rome City, Ligonier, Auburn, etc. I shall probably visit Waterloo, Angola, and other points in the northeastern end of the state.

Christianity and Science.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: These two items hav always been pretty distinctly separated until lately. From Hypatia to Galileo, and from both down to Bennett, Christianity persecuted but never adopted science. Would you believe it possible that out here in Iowa the old persecutor has taken to science suddenly, nay, enthusiastically? As an old farmer of this neighborhood remarked when he seceded from the church, "The saints will bear watching." If there was a large spot on the sun's disk, every paper would comment on it. A large spot on the fair face of science, amounting almost to an eclipse in this locality, and no one notices the phenomenon. This ominous and extraordinary amalgamation of science and Christianity seems to hav begun recently in Des Moines, Iowa, and is fast extending in a large radius from there. Lectures on science and under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association would at first view seem like progression; but really such sudden conversions as we witness of individuals into the church, and now of a whole church converted to science are too abrupt almost for belief. Among the first of these religio-scientific lectures patronized by the Young Men's Christian Association was one on geology which, as they advertise, has been received with great zest in the churches of Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska, as also in the Sunday-schools, etc. They also publish a "Zoic calendar of creation." But, alas! "The trail of the serpent is over it all." They borrow from Agazzis, Huxley, Haeckel, Dana, etc., and make a chart of strata, and of animals from Zoolites up to man. They hav eclipsed their great authorities, who only arrived at the "age of man." The Young Men's Christian Association hav put in their chart, "Age of angels." Let no one call the church behind science. I herewith inclose a specimen of their calendar topped out with "Angels." Should I be so fortunate as to capture any of the new developments they call angels, I will either box them up or cage them, or bottle them, as the case may need, and forward them for your inspection by express, C. O. D.

Christianity has until recently stoutly maintained that the duration of the earth and man was only for a period of 6,000 years, and then abruptly turns round and indorses a chart which says the earth was 375,000,000 years in cooling to fit it for vegetation and animal life, and that man is much more ancient than any Bible record allows.

I would suggest to Christianity a means by which her fabled angels might not be so wholly fictitious. Cease to persecute and imprison for an opinion, as all are liable to error. Practice the golden rule you borrowed from Confucius, "Do as you would be done by." Let not your love to God be so energetic as to extinguish philanthropy. And thus would your future "angels" become solid, sensible angels of light. But your sad record of the past has been full of bigotry and superstition, and produced chiefly angels of darkness, ergo, demons of cruelty and illiberality.

Reply to "Student."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A writer in a recent issue of your paper, signing himself "Student," says that he found in the "Bible of Bibles," in the chapter on Contradictions, out of forty-eight texts or parts of texts quoted, that thirty were "verbally incorrect." I will inform Mr. Student that if he had turned to page 440 of the "Bible of Bibles" he would hav found a full explanation of this matter. They are designedly made "verbally incorrect," because if they had not been thus abridged, the chapter on Contradictions would hav occupied nearly a hundred pages of the book. I studied condensation as an art.

What the Church Believes and Confesses, with Inquiries Concerning It.

BY DR. E. B. WHEELOCK.

The holy Catholic, apostolic, Roman church believes and confesses that there is one true and living God, Creator and Lord of heaven and earth, almighty, eternal, immense, incomprehensible, infinite in understanding and will and in all perfection; who, being a spiritual substance, one, single, absolutely simple and unchangeable, must be held to be, in reality and essence, distinct from the world, in himself and of himself perfectly happy, and unspeakably exalted above all things that are or can be conceived besides himself.

This one only true God, of his own goodness and almighty power, not to increase his own happiness, nor to acquire for himself perfection, but in order to manifest the same by means of the good things which he imparts to creatures, did, of his own most free counsel, "from the beginning of time, make alike out of nothing two created natures, a spiritual one and a corporeal one, the angelic, to wit, and the earthly; and afterward he made the human nature, as partaking of both, being composed of spirit and body" (Fourth Lateran Council, chaper 1; Firmiter). Moreover, God, by his providence, protects and governs all things which he has made, reaching from end to end mightily, and ordering all things sweetly. (Wisdom viii, 1.) For all things are naked and open to his eyes (Hebrew iv, 13), even those which are to come to pass by the free action of creatures.

QUERIES.

1. Where did this "one true and living God" reside before the creation of either heaven or earth or anything else?

2. If God is "infinite in understanding, in his will, in his perfection," please tell us from whence came the wrongs, the mistakes, which the church laments so much about? or how the possibility that either can exist?

3. If God is "spiritual substance, unchangeable, perfectly happy," I would ask, what effect, if any, can human wrongs, or wars, or persecutions, or human misery, or non-repentance, or non-conversion, hav upon an infinite "spiritual substance" of perfect happiness?

4. To affirm that this "spiritual substance" exists "distinct from matter" or somewhere outside of matter, where is its infinitude? and what use has the church for the two words omniscience and omnipresence when applied to God?

5. If from the "beginning of time" this "infinite spiritual substance" made alike out of nothing two created natures, one spiritual, the other corporeal, I would inquire how much spiritual nothing and of corporeal nothing it would reasonably require to make a respectable little eye for a common gnat, saying nothing of his spiritual part?

6. If nothing has become something from or since the "beginning of time," I would ask what there was before time was? Or did both hav a beginning out of nothing at a time when there was no time? And if in the future there should be a time when time shall be no longer, what then?

7. "Moreover, God, by his providence, protects and governs all things which he has made, reaching from end to end mightily, and ordering all things sweetly." Will the holy church, or any one else, please tell us how infinitude can hav two ends? And if it so be, where shall we direct our eye-glasses in order to find either of them?

8. If God is infinite in understanding, and governs all things, how is it that so many things are said to be wrong, out of place, requiring constant fixing and perpetual preaching to keep all things right?

9. If God is perfectly happy, and orders all things "sweetly," how is it that so much acid finds its way both within and without the infallible church and everywhere else?

10. Would it be heresy should any affirm that some things among the "all things" are not governed at all, but come by accident and are only chance results, causing sin and death, both temporal and spiritual, unexpectedly?

11. If all things are open and naked to the eyes of God, I would inquire if the plural number of two eyes would be sufficient to look in all directions at one and the same time so as to see and to govern without mistake all things sweetly?

12. Admitting that this incomprehensible spiritual substance sees absolutely even those things which are to come to pass by the free action of creatures, must he not see some most wonderful things long, long beforehand? And why should he not, when he orders all things sweetly? Now tell us from whence came sin.

13. Please take notice. If each free action of creatures is seen before it comes to pass, and if, by accident, the creature should fail to come to time, and the foreseen thing should not come to pass, would the fault be in the seeing or in the free action of the creature who failed to be there just at that time?

14. If evil really exists while God orders all things sweetly and sees all things before they come to pass, then from whence comes the evil, and whose fault is it? Is God able to abolish it? If not, is he all-powerful? Is he willing to abolish it? If not, is he infinite in goodness?

15. Is it compatible with infinite wisdom and goodness that evil should exist? If so, then why, or how, can it be evil? If not compatible, then where is infinite goodness and God's almightiness in permitting it to be? And how is it, then, that he orders all things sweetly?

16. The Theism of Rome has seen its best days. The God-idea of the Jews is also fast changing and will soon become obsolete. The grander thoughts of Bruno and Spinoza are now fast taking their place. Subscriptions from nearly every part of Europe hav been sent to proper committees in order to raise a statue of Giordano Bruno in Rome on the spot where he was burned in 1600 for publishing his advanced ideas of God. This grand idea was this: "That the universe itself, with all its manifold unfoldments, was simply an expression of God himself, and hence divine." Spinoza, Descartes, and the German schools of modern philosophy followed closely in the same paths of investigation, thus showing that Bruno left his mark in the world of thought, which, in due time, will become the God-idea of mankind.

17. Why did not the Roman church follow the example of their own conceptions of God and sweetly order that Bruno might liv? But Bruno is not dead. The universe is divine, and in it is Bruno still. It is with pleasure I write his name. His spirit identity can never be lost; that is, in my opinion. If we will study Bruno or Thomas Paine, we will study the deific laws of man's immortality. Law is law, church or no church, faith or no faith. Remove the rubbish from the unfolding temple of man and it will stand in beauty amid the flower-gardens of a future immortal summer land.

The Taxation of Church Property, Ministers of the Gospel, and Priests.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me to say something more on the subject of your leading editorial of this date, entitled "A Step Forward." Surely the friends of state secularization of New York state hav cause to be encouraged at the result of their labors during the past two years. The legislative committee on the revision of the tax laws hav, as you say, reported in favor of a modification of the present church exemption laws, so that all the property owned by any one church exceeding the value of ten thousand dollars shall hereafter be taxed; and further—which is a real reform—that the laws now exempting every minister of the gospel and every priest from taxation, in the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, shall be entirely repealed. This report of the committee is a great victory, whether the legislature sanctions it by putting it into law or not. And what has been done to bring this about?

November 28, 1878, Mr. P. Himrod, of Lyons, Kansas, wrote to me insisting that if Liberals ever accomplished anything they must take up one practical thing at a time, and work at that until it was realized. And he gave it as his opinion that the subject of church taxation was the most feasible one for Liberals at that time to engage in. This was his language: "My plan would be to attack the most vulnerable point first; devote all the power and means at your command to the carrying out of one work. If you can win at one point the citadel will eventually fall. The best chance I think is the taxation of church property."

Mr. Himrod then said if I approved of his plan, and would select a state where, in my opinion, the chances of success were the best, he would invest ten dollars in the undertaking. I selected the state of New York, and Bro. Himrod forwarded me the ten dollars. With this money I got a thousand or more blank headings printed, and some circulars, and sent them out over the state. Mr. Bennett kindly sent me his list of subscribers for this state, to each of whom I sent a copy; and most of the Liberal papers outside of the state also helped the movement. THE TRUTH SEEKER also published a form of petition, and the result was that from the city of New York some twenty thousand names went up to the Legislature at one time, and in all I sent in about that number that was forwarded to me from friends throughout the state. Some forty thousand voters, therefore, asked, by petition, to hav these exemption laws repealed, and thousands of letters were written by Liberals to their representatives in Albany urging the question upon their consideration.

Much credit is due to the Hon. George E. Williams, a Liberalist and Spiritualist, elected last year to the Assembly from Fulton, Oswego county, by the Greenback party, for what he did for the movement in the last Legislature. He presented all the petitions, introduced an act to repeal these exemption laws, and made a speech in favor of his bill.

The present winter the Hon. Charles S. Baker, from Rochester, in the Assembly, has introduced a similar bill, and he writes me that he will present all petitions in its favor that are sent him. Our energetic Rochester Liberal League, of which Amy Post is president, claims to hav done something towards securing the election of so good a representative as Mr. Baker has proved himself to be. I also learn that the Hon. Thomas G. Alvord, of the Assembly, from Syracuse, has introduced a bill something like the one recommended by the committee on tax revision.

If space will allow I would like to mention the names of some of the good workers in the state who secured long lists of names to petitions. Bro. James Johnson, of Wolcott, under the inspiration of our venerable and worthy friend, Samuel Cosad, procured the longest list, some one thousand names. The next longest list was sent in by Alexander C. Darthitt, of Jamestown—about six hundred names. Mr. C. E. Colburn, of Albion, procured four hundred and forty-two names, and many others sent petitions containing over two hundred names. In fact, the Liberals of the state everywhere took hold of the work in good earnest, and made a grand beginning by sending in to the Legislature, as above stated, over forty thousand names.

How much has been done this winter I am not prepared to say. Edgar M. Sellon, of Buffalo, has sent in a number of thousand names. I hav sent in a few, but I judge that most persons who hav obtained names this winter hav sent them directly to their representative in the Legislature; and I am inclined to think that the best way. But I fear after all this labor even this partial bill will not pass the Legislature; but whether it does or not there will be work to be done next year, for if this bill passes it leaves a great injustice standing on our statute books. What right has the Legislature to exempt a dollar of church property? As Col. Ingersoll says, "If any property is to be exempted let it be the homes of widows and orphans, not our rich, aristocratic churches, where superstition is taught." And if this does not pass next year we must redouble our exertions.

I was much pleased with an article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER a few weeks since on this subject from the pen of B. F. Babbitt, the active secretary of Hume League, No. 109. If we only had one hundred more auxiliary Liberal Leagues in this state that were alive and in earnest, we could soon make the politicians respect our petitions. This "Step Forward" is encouraging, but let us all resolve that we will hav a longer stride next time. H. L. GREEN.

Why Don't God Kill the Devil?

BY M. BABCOCK.

Why don't God kill the devil? Now, this is a fair question, and it seems strange that the good man, who, from his little pulpit, is so willing to tell us all about the devil and the great mischief that he is continually doing, never will tell us why the devil was created or why he is permitted to liv. It would seem from what they tell us that there is a great conflict going on between God and the devil as to which one shall get most of the human family; and I am sorry to say that judging from the most recent advices his satanic majesty is far ahead in the contest.

We are told that at the outset the devil had it all his own way, for God, having damned the whole human family on account of the transgression of a man and woman whom he himself had made, gave them over to the devil as being unworthy of heaven; consequently, for some four thousand years the devil had a very easy time, for God, having damned the human race, all the devil had to do was to see that the mouth of the bottomless pit was kept open and in a condition to receive the steady stream of human souls that kept dropping in. During this time the world was without a savior; there was no plan of salvation, and there was no possible way by which a man could reach heaven, except possibly occasionally one like Elijah might do so by making use of a one-horse chaise. But after four thousand years God's heart began to soften, and all at once he became possessed with a desire to save the rest of his children; and the good man tells us that God's love for his children was so great that he gave the life of his only son as a means of saving the world.

And they tell us that man can only be saved through the blood of the son; but the experiment of trying to save the world through the blood of the son thus far has not proved a very brilliant success, and for that reason I am of the opinion that the world can be saved more effectually through the blood of the devil than by any other means; so once more I ask, Why don't God kill the devil? Why does he let him, like a roaring lion, run at large among his children continually "seeking whom he may devour?" They tell us that the devil is continually tempting man to commit sin. Then if God wants man to be good, why don't he kill the devil? What would we think of a man to hear him say that he was exceedingly anxious to save his chickens and at the same time see him let a fox loose among them in his poultry-yard? I think we would say the chances are that the fox, by the arrangement, would be likely to get most of the chickens. And it is just so with the devil. By this arrangement God enables the devil to get ninety-nine of the whole human family whilst he gets but one. If the farmer would kill the fox he would save his chickens, and if God would kill the devil he might save his children. The old devil is a sly fellow, and will sometimes follow a man to church, and occasionally he catches the good man who is in the pulpit. Every prison contains from one to a dozen of these good men, who are the victims of this sly old tempter.

Now, it would seem to me that after having tried in vain for eighteen hundred years to save the world through the blood of the son, the experiment of trying to save the world through the blood of the devil should be given a trial; and in my judgment if God will kill the old mischief-maker he will hav done a big thing.

I hav always wondered why God ever created the devil at all, since he must hav known that he would defeat him in all of his plans in regard to the human family; and I want to say right here that at the time the old devil undertook to get up a rebellion, if the throne could hav been occupied by old Andrew Jackson or by old Abe Lincoln the devil would hav been licked back into the government and made to behave himself. Lincoln was too good to ever hav sent such a miserable old rebel to this earth. We are told that by and by we are to hav a happy time here in this world; all men will be honest, good, and happy, for God will actually "chain the devil for a thousand years, after which he will again be let loose for a little season" (Rev. xx, 1, 2, 3). But why should God again destroy the happiness of his children by letting the old mischief-maker loose again after he has got him bound and under his control? Now, this Bible account of letting the devil loose is either true or it is false, and if false, the Bible is a liar; if it is true, it makes God a heartless wretch—a monster who prefers to see his children led by the old devil to ruin and eternal damnation. But where does the good man, who is able to tell us all about the devil, get his information? Has he ever seen the devil? Has he ever seen anybody that has? Oh, no! all that he knows about the old fellow he gets from a book—a book that teaches the existence of devils; and also, it teaches the existence of witches (Exodus xxii. 18). No man ever saw a witch; no man ever saw the devil. Both alike are but creatures of the imagination. But this book—the Bible—with its myths of gods, ghosts, devils, witches, and its infamous lie—the dogma of an eternal hell—has drenched the earth with blood and tears. Shall we who liv in this enlightened age continue, in imitation of our ignorant forefathers, to worship a book that teaches that the world is stationary—standing on a foundation—and that the stopping of the sun would make the day longer?

Wherever the Bible has been introduced, read, and believed in it has set men to hating each other. It has set them to building dungeons, racks, and instruments of torture. It set men to killing their fellow-men for honestly denying the doctrine of witches, the doctrines of devils, hell, and eternal damnation. And only one hundred and fifty years ago, by the command of this Bible, a man might be put to death in our own country (Maryland) for denying the Trinity. The followers of this Bible always hav had their hell-hounds with which to worry and torment such as dare speak their honest opinions, unless their opinions were the opinions of the church. And even now there is a good, brave old man imprisoned by the hell-hounds of the church on account of his religious opinions. Well, that brave old hero, D. M. Bennett, will soon be once more a free man. But it is expected that the Young Men's Christian Association, with its famous hound Anthony, will be on hand to look after the interests of the church.

Why don't God kill either the devil or Anthony Comstock? It does seem as though God at least ought to kill one of them for the good of the human race, and I am of the opinion that the masses would care but little as to which one he kills first.

Mind and Organization.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been reading Amberley, Sunderland, and Denton; the last I read in The Truth Seeker of February 14th. I hav waited for some one to review them who could write well, for a man at eighty cannot write as well as when younger. My rhetoric fails me, my language is stiff, and my fingers refuse to hold a pen; yet I want to call the attention of some one that can write to the sayings in the books I hav mentioned.

In his "Analysis of Religious Belief," page 690, Amberley says, "Sensation is not assignable to organization." I stopped and thought, but couldn't remember any sensation I ever had before I was organized, so I read on.

Page 691, "The body is no part of our true selves." This was news to me, and I wondered how Amberley found that out. Then my true self is something else. I am pretty old to begin a new study, but really I am anxious to know who I am. I hav fed and clothed this body for a good many years, and thought it myself. What a mistake!

Let us read on. Page 692, "The mind is not in the body, but is an independent entity." Where is it? It can't be far off.

Again, page 692: "The mind can in no way influence the actions of the body. The mind cannot stand in a causal relation to any physical fact whatever." If this is so, the body, it seems, acts independently of the mind. We hav often said, I hav a mind to do so or so, but we were mistaken. We should hav said, I hav a body to do so and so, for, page 694, "Between that which feels, thinks, perceives, and reasons, on the one hand, and that which is felt, thought about, perceived, and reasoned on, there is no community of nature." It seems, then, that I am a twinity, having two whole and distinct natures in one person. If the mind is not in the body, where is it? If the mind is an entity independent of the body, it must be everywhere in the universe or only somewhere, and, if not in the body, where is that somewhere? It in "no way influences the actions of the body," and therefore is not chargeable for anything the body does. If the body can do what is done in the world without the influence of a mind, what is the necessity of a mind at all? And then by this we hav learned that we do without a mind, like the mosquito or the bed-bug. If no community of nature between soul or mind and body, what sympathy can exist between them? If the mind does not influence the body, then the body must hav judgment of its own to guide its actions.

But again, page 702, "There is thus not only likeness but identity of nature between ourselves and our unknown origin." Now it follows that what our unknown origin is we are. If that origin is eternal, so are we. If our origin is a compound, of what is it composed? If a simple, then every part is what the whole is. If the whole is infinite, so is every part—we are infinite. If matter can hav no effect upon the infinite, it can hav no effect upon any part; and as our "true selves" are a part of that infinite, matter can hav no influence upon us; and, as Paul says, "With the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." A part is always embraced in the whole; if a part can sin, so can the whole; if the whole cannot sin, neither can a part; both are alike. "How should we, mere fragments of that reality, define, comprehend, or describe the Infinite Being wherein we hav taken our rise and wherein we too must return?" (Page 710.) This shows the identity of our true selves and the infinite cause of all things, so that there is no nature in the universe higher or superior to our true selves.

Mr. J. T. Sunderland, in his book, "What is the Bible?" says: "This is what I mean: God is the life of all that livs, and the mover of all that moves. Every good and holy thought, every noble deed, every high endeavor, every pure aspiration, is by and through so much of God as works through humanity; for without him we can do nothing. 'In him we liv and move and hav our being.'"

This, to me, is very curious language for a man of his intelligence to use. I would as soon say: God is the death of all that dies, the breath of all that breathes, the smell of all that smells, and the taste of all that tastes, as to say he is the life of all that livs. Is life a creature, an individual entity? Just as much as hating is an entity.

Again, "God is the mover of all that moves." This sentence is so transparently absurd I scarcely know what to say. The motions of a thief, liar, murderer, and debauchee are God. Wonderful! Every good and holy thought, noble deed, etc., is by and through so much of God as works through humanity. If God is the motion of all that moves, does anything work through humanity but God? yet God is the motion of all that moves. God is the motion, "for without him we can do nothing." Without motion we can do nothing; but motion does all we do, therefore God does all we do. This proves Presbyterian Calvinism to be true. God, the great creator of all things, that upholds, directs, disposes, and governs all creatures, actions, and things, from the greatest even unto the least. So God does all that is done; his name be praised.

Mr. Denton says, "Life divine is in every atom of the universe." Amberley said no vivisection of the brain could detect mind there. Could Mr. Denton by vivisection detect life divine in a grain of sand? He says nothing but intellect could hav produced the intellect of man; it is the manifestation of an infinite and beneficent spirit. But the process is always governed by natural law. It is not a blind force; it is governed by the highest intelligences. "I see the operations of the infinite spirit; but it is the operation of law." Here law and spirit are identical. "He can only act through law; it is a part of himself." That is, he can only act through a part of himself, and how many parts constitute a whole? and of what do those parts consist? If he is an infinite spirit of the highest intelligence, he knows just what to make and how to make it; and one would think that whatever he made would be perfect, unless he preferred a poorer article to a better one. But he is a beneficent spirit, and all he makes shows what he made it for—the cow's horn to kill the sheep or pig or colt, the wolf's teeth to tear the lamb, and the myriads of biting flies to tease and annoy domestic animals from morning till night, with fleas and bed-bugs to prevent too sound a sleep. What beneficence could beat this. Everything is governed by law, and that law is the beneficent and infinite spirit of highest intelligence. Things ought to go right.

Such positions and assertions as noticed above are the legitimate result of metaphysics. Those gentlemen seem to think what they don't know is the unknown and the unknowable. Just beyond the knowledge of man is the place where all the gods were born. Formerly there were a good many, but the progress of science has reduced the number to three, and I shouldn't wonder if the process should finally annihilate the race, all but one, of whom nobody knows or can know anything.

I will now make a proposition, to which I presume no one will make any objection, and that is: Something must hav been eternal. What is eternal cannot be accounted for, as where did it come from, or who made it?

Our next question is, What is that something? Here we shall divide. The great majority will say God. I will say nature. Here begins the tug of logic; for as no one knows anything of God, proof of his existence can be furnished only from the logic of phenomena.

I shall now consider the claim of the majority, that God is eternal. And I shall take or consider him as the churches describe him.

The following description of God I take from the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian church, which will answer for the whole: There is but one only living and true God, who is infinite in being and perfection, eternal, almighty, most wise, most holy, most loving, gracious, merciful, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, most just, working all things according to the counsel of his own will.

From such a being what could we expect? Infinite in power, he could do what he pleased. Infinite in wisdom, he knew how to make everything as he wanted it. Infinitely good, he could make nothing with an element of wrong in it. Infinitely just, he could never do injustice nor suffer it to be done under his administration. Infinite in love and mercy, he could hear no one cry in great distress and agony without relieving him. If he could, all these attributes would be limited and not infinite. Has he made everything as good as he could? If he has, his omnipotence is limited. If he has not, then he preferred a poorer article to a better. He is represented as being sorry (after seeing what he turned out to be) that he had made man; it grieved him to the heart. Does their own testimony show infinite wisdom? He was also sorry that he had made Saul king.

Now let us look abroad in the world, for the tree is known by its fruit. I will begin with man, said to be the object of God's highest regard. From his birth to his grave he is suffering like disasters with the lower animals, disasters by fire and by water, by wind and by earthquake, by famine and by pestilence, by accidents and by sword, besides all the ills of sickness, loss of friends and property, and these not confined to any class. Babies snatched from the mother's loving embrace, notwithstanding her agonizing prayers and tears. Ministers, supposed to rank high for goodness, fall like all others, by the force of lightning and railroad collision. The world is one great praying-camp. On the burning ship, or cast upon the merciless rocks, or thrown among savage men, in all conditions, strong, crying prayers are sent up toward heaven, and without avail. The promise, "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find;" "They that call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved," seem all forgotten, or were not designed for this day.

Does not all this and more too, in all ages of the world, prove that God's tender mercies are over all his works? Does what we see among mankind, from the earliest time to the present, show the existence of infinite love and power? The finite love of man would not see his babe starve to death if he could feed it.

But I am aware it is said man brought all this evil on himself. Hold there! When did your babe a week old do that justly incurred sickness, sorrow, pain, and death? But you say Adam's offense brought all the miseries of life upon us. Adam did nothing that could affect his constitution or soul or body. If your little boy should ever steal a forbidden nut-cake and eat it, would you think it would hurt him or that you would be authorized and justified to whip him all day? And yet what would that be in comparison with the pains of this life and eternal perdition in another? Think of Adam's ignorance; he didn't know right from wrong, and yet people think it was just to punish him and all his race forever and ever for it. Justice with a vengeance. Where is the judge or semi-civilized court who would decree pains and penalties upon a child for an act done by another ages before it was born? But suppose this was all so; it is claimed that Christ died to satisfy all demands, as the doctrine of the church is, "The Lord Jesus hath fully satisfied the justice of his father." If this is true, why should not the prosecution cease? Among all that are born again, not one escapes the curse of the law, although it is said Christ hath redeemed us from it. The fact is that no phenomena in the world prove any such thing.

And now to my proposition that matter is the eternal entity. Matter makes itself known to us and all our senses, and science has to do with matter alone. It was the object of the chemist first to ascertain whether matter existed as a simple or a compound. Having ascertained that it consisted of some sixty-four simple elements, more or less, the next thing was to ascertain the properties of these elements and what results would take place from their infinite combinations. Scientists are constantly advancing on the domain of the unknown, and I hav no doubt they will reach the region of the unknowable, and that is the region of the gods.

We are necessarily limited in our powers of knowledge, and the universe is unlimited, therefore there will always be what to us is unknown and unknowable. Who knows what gravitation or electricity is? And yet we know they are not matter, but are invisible forms of matter proceeding from the properties of matter. We may as well call matter God as call its properties or forces God.

A very important question to be decided is whether matter has any power at all. It must hav or it is perfect inertia and automatic; moves only as moved by some exterior force, as the ax wielded by the hands of the chopper. The ax has no power to chop without the chopper. Has matter any power to move of itself? It has or has not. If it has not, then all nature, animate and inanimate, is one vast machinery, whose driving-wheel is the infinite spirit, the unknown and unknowable. This annihilates all idea of reason; the machine is not to blame, but the maker. If God turns the crank of the universe, and every wheel matches its fellow-wheel, there can be no jar. "God is the motion of all that moves." Verily, verily I say unto you, "God has foreordained whatever comes to pass." Then God has ordained that I shouldn't believe it.

If God is unknowable, science can deal with matter only; and the properties of matter being always the same, science has a rule of progress. What could chemistry do with or know of matter if God moved it whenever moved? Various compounds of very different properties may be made from the same elements in equally the same proportions, the difference arising from difference in the incorporation. As I understand natural law, it is the modus operandi of matter in its various and infinite combinations without interference by any other power. Take some syrup, insert some soda, and it foams. Mr. Sunderland says the foaming is God. Mr. Denton says the law by which it foams is God. I say the motion is produced by the fact of an incorporation. When that incorporation is accomplished the foaming subsides and the liquor becomes quiet, without any God.

I once ingrafted a pear scion into the limb of an apple tree, and it became a large part of the top of that tree and bore large, excellent pears. Here were pears made from the secretion of an apple tree. The reason can be only that the composition and properties of the pear wood were such as to modify the sap of the apple tree that would make pears instead of apples.

Now this may be done at any suitable time without asking God anything about it, relying on the properties of nature. Composition and incorporation make all the difference between the raiser of animals and between the raiser of man, as between all individuals. All farmers know how to improve or increase the fertility of soil by adding fertilizing matter, and how and what to feed their stock to best advantage. And when we hav learned all it is possible for man to know of nature there will much remain unknown and unknowable.

The "Alpha."

Dear Readers of The Truth Seeker: I want to introduce to your notice a little paper which has lately become a favorite of mine—the Alpha. It is devoted to sexual purity and the right generation as well as regeneration of mankind. I hav taken it for over a year, and sent out my copies far and near, but as the great importance of its work presses more deeply upon my mind, I find myself impelled to do something in a more public way for its introduction to the great world that is so needing the good advice and wise and intelligent reasoning it offers for the truths it advocates.

Inclose ten cents, addressed to Caroline B. Winslow, M. D., No. 1 Grant place, Washington, D. C., for a specimen number, or subscribe for the paper according to the terms below and I am sure you will be better, purer, and wiser and happier for the knowledge you will reap from its pages. The Alpha is published on the first day of each month, by the Moral Educational Society, of Washington, D. C., and can be obtained of newsdealers, or will be sent at the following rates: Single copy, one year, $1.00; six months, 50 cents; three months, 25 cents.

The Reception Committee

Met on Monday to complete arrangements for making the ovation to be given to Mr. Bennett a grand one. Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker, of the Boston Globe, being in the city for a few days, was invited to be present. He gave the Committee a very graphic and interesting account of the indignation meeting held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the conviction of Mr. Heywood.

The sub-committee on halls reported prices and conditions from various ones. The Committee were in favor of Cooper Union, and as that was engaged for Sunday evening it was found necessary to change the date to Saturday evening May 1st, which was done. The Committee also engaged Graffula's band for the occasion, so there will be the best of music. Friends from a distance who wish to be present can, by sending their names to either D. E. Ryan, 231 West Thirty-seventh street, Dr. Foote, 120 Lexington avenue, or this office, hav seats reserved for them. Arrangements will also be made with hotels in the vicinity of Cooper Union whereby those from out of town will hav accommodations at special rates. We hope thousands will come on the occasion, and make this demonstration one of the largest and most earnest protests against the encroachments of bigotry ever held in this country. The occasion demands it. The outrage is one of the grossest that ever occurred, and should be rebuked in every possible way. There should be no faltering. The voice of the people must be lifted up in a strong cry of indignation at the high-handed manner in which liberty of speech and of the press has been invaded. Every victim stricken down should be exalted high over the heads of his oppressors and they made to feel that though temporarily successful in imprisoning their victim they are defeated in the long run.

The following letters were read at the Monday meeting. We trust that Mr. Parton's fears are unfounded, but should they prove true the meeting will be changed from joy to indignation. But we think there is no doubt but that Mr. Bennett will be with us on the occasion. We sincerely hope Mr. Parton can be with us:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., March 20, 1880.

DANIEL E. RYAN, My Dear Sir: I hav been prevented from answering sooner your note of March 14th, inviting me to attend and take part in the reception of D. M. Bennett on his release at the end of April. Are you quite sure he will be released then? I confess I hav had my fears. It would be no more unjust to imprison him another year than it was to imprison him last year, and the men who did it then are just as capable of doing it now. There is another prosecution hanging over him. Comstock must still invent pretexts for drawing his eighty dollars a week from rich soap-boilers. I trust no precautions will be neglected to baffle the shameless bigots who hav done this hideous wrong.

I cannot now engage to be present at the reception, but hope to be able to attend. All New York ought to turn out to welcome him home, and not one person in New York is safe while such things can be done as the imprisonment of that innocent man.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

P. S.—Let no one forget to remember D. M. Bennett on the first Tuesday of next November. J. P.

The next is from one of the Southern Liberals:

CHARLESTON, S. C., March 21, 1880.

MR. D E RYAN, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed $1.00 towards Mr. Bennett's reception. As to the telegraphing, that will be very interesting. Giv correct directions and I will correspond to it. Respectfully, B. DOSHER.

The following is from our indefatigable chairman, Mr. Green. Unlike many shallower thinkers he overlooks the immediate cause, and, seeing the principle violated, vigorously protests. We regret the circumstances that will prevent Mr. Green participating:

SALAMANCA, N. Y., March 16, 1880.

DANIEL E RYAN, ESQ., Dear Sir: Yours of the 14th inst., inviting me to attend a public reception to be given to D. M. Bennett at the time of his release from prison, is received. Nothing would giv me more pleasure than to accept your invitation if circumstances would permit, but as they will not, I must forego the satisfaction. I believe that Mr. Bennett's conviction and imprisonment will be put down by the future historian as one of the greatest governmental crimes against the liberty of speech and of the press of this country. It was not because he circulated "Cupid's Yokes," but because he was the editor of an Infidel paper, that he was punished.

With the opinions advanced in the pamphlet above named I hav no sympathy whatever, but, on the contrary, believe they are the very worst that could be promulgated. Still I think that Mr. Heywood, the author, is an honest man, who is sincerely working for what he believes is the best interest of humanity; and I am in favor of the repeal of any law that will not allow his publications the same right to pass through the mails as the publications of the American Tract Society or the American Bible Society. I hav such faith in truth that I am willing to put it on an equality with error everywhere, and that is all we can justly demand as good citizens, and that we should demand of the government. Our motto must be, "Privilege for none; justice for all."

I hope your public reception will be a success, and of such a character as to convince the public at large that the spirit of liberty is still alive in this republic.

Fraternally yours, H. L. GREEN.

Prof. Toohey, as will be seen from his letter, will be here and arouse the meeting with one of his eloquent addresses.

CHELSEA, MASS., March 18, 1880.

MR. D. E. RYAN, Dear Sir: Yours of the 14th found me slightly afflicted with neuralgia, hence my delay. With returning strength to make free use of the pen, I hasten to say I will find pleasure in being among the friends of D. M. Bennett on the occasion of "his release from prison," and will cheerfully do all in my power, co-operatively with others, to make that day as worthy of Liberalism as the effort to celebrate should be honorable to him.

Very cordially yours, J. H. W. TOOHEY.

Time has not elapsed for the other invited speakers to be heard from, but there is no doubt there will be enough of the best speakers of the country to make the occasion one of the most memorable in the annals of our country. We again invite and urge all the Liberals who possibly can to be present. We promise them a cordial welcome and a rousing meeting.

A Pious Wail.

The New York Observer, we presume our readers are aware, is a religious organ. The Rev. Ireræus Prime is the chief editor, and no one will dispute his piety, neither will they doubt his intolerance. When he gets to heaven and ranges himself alongside of Calvin there will be music. Heretical angels, and those not disposed to pay for what they do not want nor get, will hav a hard time. The air will be full of pious flames, and the way to hell will be crowded with the fallen angels thrown over the battlements. Prime believes in worshiping "Gaud," and he also believes in making other people support the house in which he does it. If they will not do it voluntarily, he would force them to by law. He is a good Christian, of the Puritan style, with a tincture of medieval brutality. If a doubt ever entered his mind, he choked it back with the ease peculiar to reverends in receipt of fine salaries. Here is his little wail over the bill reported by our state Legislature taxing the houses of "Gaud:" "It is probable that the bill now before the Legislature will be passed, taxing all churches in the state, with the exemption of $10,000, and all theological seminaries and colleges and schools not supervised by the state. Every person interested—and who is not?—ought to bring all his influence to bear on the members of the Legislature with whom he is acquainted. Petitions ought to be sent in from all parts of the state against this measure, and perhaps the great wrong may be prevented. But not one day should be lost."

We believe, with our religious contemporary, that everybody is interested in this bill. All lovers of justice and fair play are decidedly interested. Every workingman who pays rent is interested. Every property holder in the state is interested. Every farmer, mechanic, and professional man is interested. Every dollar drawn from the state treasury to protect churches has to be paid by somebody. It seems to us that the "great wrong" is in forcing people to pay for what they do not want and what a large part of our citizens regard as positively injurious. It may not seem so to a follower of Calvin, who burns men because they do not subscribe to his creed; but we fancy that the idea of universal liberty in the matter of supporting religions is one that will grow, and whether the present Legislature pass the law or not, future legislative bodies will be compelled to tax not only values over $10,000, but every cent held by churches the same as other property. Our religious contemporary will please bear this in its Calvinistic mind.

Comstock Backed by the Baptists.

The letter in the Tribune recently, copied into this paper, signed by a "Baptist Clergyman," made quite a stir in clerical circles. At the regular weekly meeting of Baptist clergymen last week Comstock was invited to rise and explain, which he did in the manner peculiar to himself. He brought out his omnipresent carpet bag of smut and regaled his clerical brethren with a recital of prurient details, which in an assemblage of any but ministers would hav insured his being pitched out of doors. But these reverend seducers were glad to listen, and when one young man with a little decency left—owing to his being fresh in the ministry—mildly, very mildly objected, he was howled down by his older and more hardened associates, and cries of "go on" came from all parts of the hall. And when he said he could tell them instances of moral pollution that would fill them with horror, he was greeted with expressions of approval and cries of "Let's hear them."

Comstock swore by high heaven that his motives were pure, that he was personally incorruptible, that he had tremendous courage in fighting the hordes of wickedness, and, what was of more consequence, that he had unfaltering confidence in "divine favor."

After all this, he commenced on Mr. Bennett, who, he said, was the author of "Cupid's Yokes," and a totally depraved Infidel. He told as many lies as his time allowed him to crowd in, making frequent references to "Almighty Gaud," and how sure he was that he had the "divine" approval in crushing out "the publications of Freelovers and Freethinkers." He said, in response to an inquiry by an anxious Baptist brother, that the Liberals of the country were divided into "obscene Liberals" and "anti-obscene Liberals," all of which stuff was swallowed by the brethren as readily as the immaculate conception.

In no assemblage but a clerical one could a man lie with such brazen effrontery and expect to hav it believed But a body used as they are to lying in the pulpit, and capable of gulping down all the obscenity and improbable stories of the Bible, can be expected to believe anything and that is, perhaps, why Anthony chose them to explain before.

We would like to see what effect the truth would hav had upon them, but it would hav been dangerous alike to the relater and the audience to hav tried it. At the close a special prayer was sent up to "Almighty Gaud" for Comstock's benefit, with what effect remains to be seen.

Church Discipline.

The following letter from the "Consistory" of the First Reformed church of East Orange, N. J., and the reply show how the church in these days tries to keep the chains upon the minds of its adherents. But a few decades ago our friend Williams would hav been racked or burned. All that his censors can do now, however, is to fulminate their church thunders against him, a proceeding, to judge from his letter, he cares very little about. A few months ago he was a full believer, but getting hold of THE TRUTH SEEKER about the time Mr. Bennett was put in prison, and reading and inquiring into the cause of his incarceration, first awakened doubts. He then subscribed. Afterward his "Consistory" expelled him for heresy. The "Consistory" is consistent, although the church does not appear to be very greatly "reformed." Here is the correspondence:

CONSISTORY ROOMS, FIRST REFORMED CHURCH,
EAST ORANGE, NOV. 4, 1879.

MR. WM. SMITH WILLIAMS, Dear Brother: Having repeatedly refused to listen to our private spiritual admonitions, you are now cited to appear before the Consistory of the First Reformed Church of Orange on Tuesday evening, 18th inst., at 9 o'clock, in the consistory room of the church, to answer the charge of HERESY, in denying, 1st, the absolute and final authority of the Bible as the word of God. 2d, the true Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ as God, the Son of God.

3d, The infinite value and efficacy of the Blood of Jesus Christ to make atonement for the soul.

With earnest prayers that you may see the true nature of the sin you are committing in thus treading under foot the Son of God, in counting the Blood of the Covenant, wherewith you were sealed, an unholy thing, and in doing despite unto the spirit of Grace, we remain,

Yours faithfully,

THE CONSISTORY OF THE FIRST REFORMED CHURCH.
JOS. B. FENBY, Clerk.

EAST ORANGE, N. J., Nov. 17, 1879.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN, AND ESPECIALLY TO THE CONSISTORY OF THE FIRST REFORMED CHURCH OF EAST ORANGE, My Dear Brothers and Sisters: Excuse me for the liberty I hav taken in so addressing you, but as mortals inhabiting this mundane sphere you warrant its use. I must also claim your indulgence in the expression of my views upon the grave charge you hav preferred against me, viz., heresy, in denying the absolute and final authority of the word of God. Now, I must ask upon what authority you claim that it is the word of an all-powerful, all-wise, and benevolent God, sharing his bountiful blessings at all times? Let us stop and ask the question, Can this God be the cruel, vindictive (Jer. xiii, 14) being that is spoken of in the Bible, to make a world and then drown it (Gen. vi, 6), and to put a lie into Ahab the prophet's mouth (1 Sam., xvi, 1, 2; 1 Kings xxii, 23)? Not to be all-powerful (Judges i, 19) when we know that there is nothing impossible with him; a God of anger (Jer. xvii, 4; Num. xxii, 13; Num. xxv, 4;) when we know that he is a God of love?

Do you know (if not, allow me to tell you) that such is the magnitude of God's power that he, in his great works of nature, has made no two alike? I will defy you to find two leaves alike in any great forest. How, then, can you expect to find any two men's minds alike in the great chain of nature? It is not by my will but God's that I hav been made to clash in opinion with you, and if you pray that my mind may be turned away from the paths I am treading, you are supplicating to your maker to change his great work of which he knows best how to judge; and I think such works had better be left to him who comprehends the dust of the earth and metes out heaven with a span. He is the great omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient ruler; but your Bible makes him not so. Allow me to refer you to some of the passages (Gen. iii, 8; Gen. xi, 5; Gen. xviii, 20, 21;) and then, if you will think with an unbiased mind, you will agree with me in denouncing the Bible as the word of God, and only written by men at various times and only reflecting thoughts that occurred to their minds, and not emanated from divine authority. By having a poor opinion of that work you will hav a great opinion of God's power and wisdom. But you, by taking the Bible as your standard, must hav a poor opinion of God.

Now, my dear brethren, I hav expressed my opinion, and trusting you will giv it a careful, unbiased thought, and that you will not decide upon any conviction until you hav weighed it in the balance of reason, truth, and justice, carefully referring to the various passages I hav cited, which are, as it were, but a grain of sand from the Atlantic beach, I subscribe myself

Yours for truth and justice to your maker,

WM. S. WILLIAMS.

Organize Leagues.

I learn that Prof. W. S. Bell is arranging a tour for lectures throughout the West, and that he intends to make it a point to urge on Liberals whom he visits to organize auxiliary Leagues. This is the surest way to push the League work, as is shown in the success of Prof. O. A. Phelps in Kansas. As soon as Liberals see the value of united effort they will organize. There are Liberals enough in the country to hold the balance of power, but, like grains of sand, they are powerless to attack or resist in the political field. Our opponents are organized, and ready to use their power at the shortest notice, as we frequently find to our hurt. Instead of discouraging, this should excite us to work for our own safety. There is danger ahead. A storm is gathering, and our only hope of riding safely through it is in organization and united action. A. L. RAWSON,

A Correction.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Dr. E. B. Foote, of 120 Lexington avenue, New York city, writes to me: "Inclosed I send you a check for five dollars, which is the contribution from myself and son, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr. We both appreciate your labors, and except for the fact that we are expending money all the time in our warfare against the Comstock regime, we should undertake to do better. I am sorry that your card to the friends of the Liberal League movement in The Truth Seeker of March 20th did not contain your address. Many who read your card would perhaps sit down and send you a remittance if they were sure of sending it to the right place. If I were in your place I would repeat the same card and append full address."

I comply with the suggestion of my generous friend, and request you, Mr. Editor, to republish the following card, and also your very complimentary editorial comments.

H. L. G.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE MOVEMENT.

A year ago I requested the friends of the Liberal League movement to contribute something to aid me in my work as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League. Since then I hav received donations from various friends amounting to $111.10.

If I do my duty for the next year as chairman of that committee I shall be compelled to devote my whole time to the work. This I cannot do unless those who are interested in the movement will aid me. A very small sum from each person interested will carry me and my family through the next year. My Liberal friends, I leave this matter with you. If you will sustain me in my labors for the coming year I promise you I will do much more than I ever hav done before. Contributions will be acknowledged through The Truth Seeker and Investigator. H. L. Green.

Salamanca, N. Y. Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

[We commend the above appeal of Bro. Green to the earnest consideration of our readers. He is in every way worthy of support, and cannot be too generously rewarded by the Liberal public. Our cause has no firmer friend, no stancher advocate, no more indefatigable worker in its best interests, than H. L. Green.—Ed. T. S.]

Liberal League Notes.

The latest League organized at this date is No. 177, Yankton, Dakota, with that earnest worker, D. P. Wilcox, as temporary secretary.

During the last ten days five Leagues hav been chartered at the following places: No. 173, Philadelphia, Pa; No. 174, Blooming Grove, Kansas; 175, Darlington, Wis.; 176, Utica, N. Y.; and the one above named, No. 177.

Mr. Alfred Warren, of 249 Central avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, is publishing much first-class Liberal literature. He has just issued a neat pamphlet, entitled "Progressive Religion," an address delivered by E. P. Brown at the late Paine celebration in that city. It is well worth the price, ten cents. Reader, do not fail to order it at once.

There are many of our people who, on account of the distance and expense, cannot attend the Bennett reception in New York. Allow me to suggest how they might celebrate Mr. Bennett's release in a practical manner. In every locality where ten or more Liberals reside, let them meet April 29th and organize themselves into a Liberal League. Let us welcome Mr. Bennett with two hundred auxiliary Leagues.

I am informed by good authority that the Freidenker, of Milwaukee, since its fusion with Heinzen's Pionier, is one of the ablest Freethought journals published in this country in the German language. I also learn that Carl Doerflinger, the editor, is friendly to the National Liberal League movement and is doing much to aid the cause among our German fellow-citizens. I hope every Liberal, whatever his nationality, who is familiar with the German language, will subscribe for the Freidenker. Bro. Doerflinger is one of the Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League.

The last mail brings me a very interesting letter from M. H. Coffin, of Longmont, Colorado, who so well represents that state on the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League. Bro. Coffin is making an effort to raise a fund for the purpose of engaging some Liberal speaker to stump the state. This is the way he reasons: "Church-members of no more means than I possess giv $25 per year to perpetuate superstition, and we should be as free with our money as they are with theirs; and for me, I desire from this time forward to giv $25 each year to help our cause and to make a good beginning in the year 1880. I want it to go into a fund to employ a No. 1 man to lecture and organize Leagues in this state." The kind of a man friend Coffin desires is "one who can meet and whip all opponents in a gentlemanly manner." Who can fill the bill?

It is encouraging to hear what our friends are doing in the "City of Brotherly Love." Dr. R. C. Flower writes: "I am doing everything I can for the League movement for my heart is in it. Mr. J. L. Roberts, editor of Mind and Matter, is enthusiastic in the work. We expect to organize a number of Leagues in the city and suburban towns during the spring and summer. We are going to thoroughly organize for active warfare and carry our cause into the city and state politics. I am speaking to immense crowds every Sunday. I say to Spiritualists everywhere, Let me urge you to support the National Liberal League." That is the way to talk. We want all the help we can get against the combined hosts of orthodoxy who will stand together for a union of church and state, in which the church shall be the controlling partner.

Mr. J. E. Baum, of Orange, N. J., makes the very sensible suggestion that after the Presidential election is over we concentrate all our strength in one state and work there until we carry it. He says, "Why do we not concentrate our forces in one state where the Leagues are most numerous (Kansas, for instance), and get formidable in that state first; get control of it if possible. That would do more than anything else to aid the movement in the other states. The lecturers, male and female, could all be employed to work in this one state at the same time. Every Liberal would be willing to contribute some money to help carry on the campaign. If the Liberals could see some real progress they would contribute more liberally to the cause." I hav good reasons for saying that there is no man in the United States who desires the success of our cause more than does Bro. J. E. Baum.

The Sub-Committee of the National Liberal League for the state of California hav recently issued a circular in which they say, "It is proposed by a number of earnest Liberals of this city (San Francisco) and state to establish a Freethought journal and Liberal publishing house, and hav in connection therewith a headquarters, with library, for the use and benefit of friends from all portions of the country visiting San Francisco." Further on they say: "We hav done nothing on this coast. Let us act, and act like men loyal to humanity. Let us enter into the heroic spirit of the National Liberal League, and with the zeal, enthusiasm, and energy which characterizes it throughout the East, West, and South, we can build up on the Pacific coast a magnificent branch of the tree of liberty, which is destined to shield, protect, and advance thorough non-sectarian government." H. L. Green.

Community but No Communism.

A few laboring men on January 16th formed the York Farming and Manufacturing Association, for the purpose of organizing a co-operative colony. It was proposed, if they were successful in forming this, to remove to Northern Texas, at some point on the line of the Texas Pacific Railroad. The society has increased so rapidly in numbers since its organization, and has received such financial support, that it has been settled that the colony shall start for Texas the first week in September.

Its agents are examining now a tract of land in Gonzales county, Texas, 1,660 acres in extent, which has been offered to them, fully equipped, on ten years' credit. If they do not conclude to take this, one of their members owns 1,280 acres of land in Kendall county, which they will probably buy. In a conversation with a Tribune reporter yesterday, in regard to the plan of the society, H. E. Sharp, its president, said:

"The colony we intend to settle is to be carried on by a system never tried before. It will be more like a community than a colony, though it could not be strictly called a community."

"How does your system differ from that of the Shakers or the Oneida Community?"

"In the first place it is to be purely secular. We intend to tolerate all religions but to propagate none. Secondly, we do not carry the idea of common property as far as they do. They own all their property in common. We intend that only our stores, farms, and manufacturing establishments shall be common property. The profits of the colony, if there are any, are to be divided among the members of the society annually. Everybody is to be paid for the work he does, and will liv as he pleases. We recognize the fact that persons hav different tastes, and that any community which compels all its members to conform to the same mode of life must inevitably fail."

"Hav you any other rules peculiar to yourselves?"

"No. We hav a good many very strict laws; for instance, one prohibiting the use of liquor; another decreeing that the property of the society shall never be divided; but all these hav been adopted at some time or another by other communities."

"Are you sure that you will be able to start for Texas in September?"

"There is not the slightest doubt of it."

The officers of the society are: President, H. E. Sharp; Secretary, W. E. Clegg. The meetings of the society are held every Saturday night at No. 207½ East Ninth street.—Tribune.

A Note from Mr. Denton.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Daniels, in your last, criticises what he calls my article in the issue of February 14th. But of what he calls my article I never wrote a line. It is merely a report, and a very defective one, of a lecture given by me on the origin of man. I believe in no God apart from the universe, though the universe in which I believe includes considerably more than what Mr. Daniels appears to believe in. I shall publish the lecture in full before long. William Denton.

Another Friend Gone.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mrs. Jennie C. Kelly-Holmes, my dear wife, departed this life on the 8th of this month, at the home of her parents, Oxford, Wisconsin, aged thirty years nine months and nineteen days. As she had come to love The Truth Seeker, and sympathize with Mr. Bennett, and I believe had her faith shaken—if nothing more—in the brimstone doctrine, though but three years ago a member of the church founded by the bloodthirsty burner of Servetus, I should like to hav it published in your paper. Her disease was consumption. I shall not attempt any words in her praise, as words would fail me. J. E. Holmes.

D. M. Bennett.

MR. EDITOR: Many attempts hav been made to destroy his popularity and influence among the masses of the Liberals, but happily for him and for the cause of Liberal thought these attacks hav been in vain. He is more popular, and will wield a wider influence when he comes forth from his prison-cell, than he did on entering it. His real strength may be measured by the meanness of the assaults which his enemies hav made upon him. The unscrupulousness of the Comstock crusade needs no discussion, but when his professed co-Liberals nose around to find some bits of malicious slander, they show their weakness by the additional malice they display in giving wide and trumpeted circulation to such calumnies. And all this by the pure in heart! These pure-minded men and women would not publish aught of Bible vulgarity. Oh, no! They are opposed to obscene literature, but if we may believe their interpretations of certain letters of D. M. Bennett, they are grossly obscene.

Now, what will be the outcome of this malignant persecution of D. M. Bennett? It will augment his power as a leader of Liberal thought. The Index must go down. Its narrow tests of respectability, its ambition to rule or ruin, its bitter self-righteousness, its "cultured" Freethought, utterly disqualify it for leadership; nay, these traits are so illiberal that the paper must go to the rear and perish in disgrace. And the day of doom, I fancy, is not far distant. It has been my good fortune to talk with hundreds of Liberals through the West on the Bundy, Abbot & Co. conspiracy, and I am happy to be able to say that with the exception of two persons, not readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, every one with whom I had any conversation on the subject was an admirer of D. M. Bennett, or at least thought him greatly wronged and persecuted by the "cultured" crusaders. The little man of the Index would learn a great deal of good, hard sense if he were to go West and talk with the unconventional but true American of the prairies and plains. I fear that his spirit, if it survives the crash of the Index and his own minimum mortality, will return to read his epitaph, "Died of over-culture!"

The people of the West are supporters of D. M. Bennett from common-sense considerations. They see that he is thoroughly in earnest, and that he is neither pedant, hypocrite, nor coward. His paper is not designed for any "cultured" aristocracy. He is not very anxious to appear "respectable" in the eyes of his enemies. It is not a part of his aim to win commendatory "notices" from the Christian press and pulpit. He conducts a large journal, which hits errors hard blows, exposes fraud, and also givs the latest words of science. It is both destructive and constructive. If it tears down the false, it also strives to build up liberty, equality, and fraternity.

No side issues will long distract the public mind from those cardinal principles upon which THE TRUTH SEEKER is conducted. Thousands of its readers will now begin to count the days until its editor is released from durance vile. The general sentiment of regard and affection cherished for him by the Liberals at large show that it was but the incarnation of stupidity that led the Bundy and Abbot faction to assault a noble man who was already defenseless. Their folly is now apparent. Time will speedily right many of his wrongs. Yours, etc., W. S. BELL.

New Bedford, Mass., Feb. 24, 1880.

Reply to Allen Noe's "Immortality."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: How does Mr. Noe know that "the soul has and always will be a living, independent entity," and yet "we cannot conceive of intelligence existing entirely outside and independent of organization?" How will he reconcile these two statements? Is soul one thing and intelligence another? Is either one or the other a thing, a "living entity?" The Materialist denies it, and calls on Mr. Noe for the proof. But Mr. Noe believes that each and every soul, mind, or intellect has "traveled" through all the kingdoms below, and up through all the organisms until man is reached. How does he know this, and where is the proof? If his soul traveled through these stages, through all the ages from protoplasm, bacteria, fishes, reptiles, birds, and quadrupeds, up to its present stage of occupation in his own body, will he inform us whether his soul has lost or still retains its consciousness of identity in all its travels through the lower organisms up to the present one?

Is he conscious of his own identity in his fish life, reptile, bird, or quadruped mode of existence? If so, let him giv his experience in those stages of development, Of course he did not lose his identity when he entered the body of the genus homo, for here were brains of the highest order. In other words, his soul retained its identity when he was born, and he must be conscious of the remarkable event. If, on the other hand, he has no consciousness of identity when he was born, nor prior to his birth, what guarantee can he present, derived from the unconscious past, to justify us in believing in a conscious future?

If some gross physical organism from the lowest type upward were essential for the manifestation of his soul in the past, then, based on this belief, how can he assume that some gross physical body will not be essential for the manifestation of his soul or intelligence in the future? But what hav we to say about this human hickory-nut, with its two coats, or rather two bodies, the grosser physical body and the finer physical body, with the germ incased in both, that is, the life principle, the soul incased within the finer body or shell? Why, simply this, when we remove the outside and the inside shell also, the germ, or nucleus, dies. So with the life principle or soul, it dies likewise, that is, supposing it ever had an existence in the proper sense of the term. Nothing exists but the elements of matter, and these elements only are infinite and eternal.

For the sake of argument, let us admit Mr. Noe's "finer body" (the abode of the soul), the physiology and pathology of which he absolutely knows nothing, what about the life principle, intelligence, or soul? is that material too? If not, it must be immaterial; and being immaterial, it cannot be a mode of the one, and only one, existence. [Soul or life principle, then, can be none other than a quality, function, or attribute of the one existence. He says, "The spirit is not the man, but the finer organism which he dwells in." In other words, the spirit is the "finer shell" of the human hickory-nut, and the soul, according to Mr. Noe, is the man with the two coats on. Hence, as I hav shown above, the life principle, soul, or man being immaterial, must necessarily be a quality, function, or attribute, and therefore subject to all the changes the physical bodies are subject to. Soul cannot, with the slightest show of reason, be regarded as an existence per se.

Mr. Noe admits that "the spirit so called is really refined matter and is subject to natural laws." Well, then, one of the natural laws, the most imperative and consistent of them all, is the eternal law of change. One form to-day, another form takes its place to-morrow. Lower forms of matter changing to higher forms, then dissolving, and their elements entering into new combinations in the lower forms of existence; and, according to the law of evolution, again and forever going through the same routine as before.

In the universe there are no exhaustive processes at work. The lower supply the higher modes or forms of being, and the higher return to supply the lower, and so on, ad infinitum.

But Mr. Noe's Spiritualistic theory infers an exhaustive process, since his views lead to the conclusion that all animal modes of being are subservient to one great end, viz., the vehicle or instrument for soul manifestation. The ultimatum of his soul, or intelligence, according to Mr. Noe, contrary to natural law, is an unchangeable existence. Mr. Noe seems incapable of perceiving that if the spirit be material and the soul be an attribute or function of that spirit, then both must obey the irresistible and eternal law of change, in which conscious identity in one form is utterly lost in succeeding forms. Then of what use is immortality?

If the destiny of the grosser forms or modes of existence is their conversion into spirit as a finality, then all forms of existence below spirit existence must ultimately cease altogether. The source becoming exhausted, the animal kingdom being extinct, spirit and soul must be utterly cut off from any further supplies.

Suppose, for instance, the spirit and soul of Franklin, according to natural law, having suffered change, he has lost his identity and taken up his abode in the grosser form or organism of an oyster, he must work his way up, travel through all the degrees until he again takes the highest honors in the gift of nature to bestow. If this be immortality, and this, according to Mr. Noe's theory, is all the immortality possible, of what practical benefit can it be to humanity? T. R. KINGET, M.D.

Truth Makes Free.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: This is alleged in John viii, 32, so that all believing in that book must believe in the heading of this article. It likewise follows that the converse of it is true, viz., that ignorance and error enslave. The inference is no less clear that it is the duty and the interest of every sane person to seek, with an unbiased mind, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Failing to do this, we are enslaved; doing this, we are in due time free.

In the leading-strings of partisans, of whatever sect, no one can be free. Hence even Paul (1 Cor. i, 11–17) admonishes against all party spirit. That in some measure the Jews are subservient to their rabbis, the Catholics to their popes, cardinals, and priests, the Protestants to their ministers, and especially D.D.'s, is too clear to need illustration and too obvious to need proof. That ignorance and error, to some extent, are found in all these sects, is likewise nearly self-evident. The testimony of each against all the others is to this effect. Indeed, the fact of their division and conflicts puts their errors beyond all doubt. Therefore, not having the truth, they cannot be free. Instances and events transpiring daily confirm this deplorable fact. We submit a few at hand:

In this city, some two years since, the members of the leading Methodist church were taught that their Lord would hav them erect a superior house for his worship. Hence they began, and continued, to giv, to beg, and to collect some $30,000, and with it to put up the finest church structure in Nashville, the spire rising, Saul-like, head and shoulders above all others. Being already taught that the Lord would hav them in solemn ceremony dedicate this splendid edifice to him and his momentous cause, it was accordingly done. Judging from the imposing rites, the songs, the prayers, and the sermon, to a crowded house, if any acts, any worship, can ever be acceptable to their Lord, those of that occasion were pre-eminently so. The church was thus openly, solemnly, and in accordance with his word, divinely given to Jesus, their Savior, as surely as they had given themselves to him when baptized in him. (Romans vi, 1–4.)

If the Lord, as the Bible asserts, absolutely received from his people the splendid temple built for him and dedicated to him under the old dispensation, who can doubt that under the more effulgent light of the new, Christ, as their great high-priest and intercessor in heaven, did receive and accept the dedication of this structure? As his presence shone in the temple, did it not in this? If not, then their ceremonies, their offerings, and their prayers at its dedication, and repeatedly since, were vain, and worse than in vain.

Nevertheless, distrusting his acceptance and fearing that he would not take care of it, his children had it insured, and that too mostly by unbelieving underwriters. The company likewise having no faith that Christ would care more for that than any other house, would risk on it not more than two-thirds of its cost. Sure enough, some four months since, just as their newly-assigned D.D. had gone through with his first Sabbath discourse, prayers, and ceremonies, fire broke out in the grand edifice, and, despite all efforts, it was consumed. Wonderful too that there is scarcely a plausible theory as to how it caught. Not long since a brisk storm struck Nashville, and three more of the Lord's houses went. The poor darkies had toiled for seven tedious years to get up a similar church to the fine one (McKendree) destroyed by fire, and under the wind it went with the other two.

Now were this an enterprise of science, the matter would here stop. Common sense would recognize the fact that Christ had not accepted, nor would accept, such churches, or that he had no power to keep the elements from destroying them. Hence common sense would keep those using it from giving, wasting, or throwing away another dime on such folly. But ignoring, as they do, all sense, science, and logic, clinging to blind superstition, the deluded religionists at once commence a second crusade to rebuild and to honor the God destroying, according to their faith, their works. Were an angel from their heaven sent, or a second Balaam's ass commissioned, to speak the utter contempt of their Lord for such houses, the fact could be made no clearer.

The key to the enigma is in the biased subserviency of the poor unthinking dupes. They are not free, but under a priestly senseless yoke. Could such victims rise to a true manhood, look straight at facts, do their own independent thinking, and search for truth instead of blind authority, they might know the truth and rejoice in being free.

To this end, that is, to induce as many as we can thus to do, should be our daily work. If it seem that truth is not mighty, that after all it may not prevail, let us see that the fault is not at our own door. Wise, persistent work will verify the maxim and bring us to rejoice with the converts truth has made. Indeed, we should take pleasure in the love, the acquisition, and the spread of that pure, practical truth which will make me and all free. W. PERKINS.

Logic of Facts.—Logic of Errors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The free platform, so nobly and truly kept open to all correspondents, whereby all or any views can be expressed through the columns of your TRUTH SEEKER, is a privilege one can not find in many of the newspapers published in this land of boasted freedom.

I am well pleased with the discussion which is going on in your columns upon Spiritualism. I ask a right of both parties. That right is to allow me to say a few words upon the subject.

For nine years I hav studied the subject. I hav written upon it; hav lectured upon it; but the more I read, the more I think, the more truth and error mixed up in the subject do I see. The truth of Spiritualism is only one fact, a fact that can be proved to be true; but that fact does not prove Spiritualism true. It proves the honesty of the believer. Here is the one fact, and the only fact, of any importance in connection with Spiritualism: The belief in any proposition, whether true or false, has the same effect upon the believer so far as acts of volition are concerned. The Spiritualist believes that at seances spirits do come. Whether they come or not, the belief has the same effect as far as the acts of volition are concerned. Suppose one gentleman asks another, "Is this a good five-dollar note?" They both examine it. One believes it is good; the other believes it is bad. The two act differently. One will hav nothing to do with it; the other will. One would burn it; the other would pay it. Whether the note was good or bad, each gentleman acted upon his belief. The note is Spiritualism. The two gentlemen who examine it are Mr. Materialist and Mr. Spiritualist. Mr. Materialist says to Mr. Spiritualist: "More light at this seance. Throw open your windows. Let me see what you are doing; leave loose of my hands; stop singing, so that I can hear. Call you this an investigation of spirit claims? Here I am' sitting in the dark to enable me to see my hands locked fast in the grip of my next neighbor, for fear I should handle the spirit in the dark; with singing to gather up the sounds ringing in my ears, to enable me to hear what your medium is doing."

The Materialist, when he invites the Spiritualist to examine the claims of Materialism, says: "I will giv all the light I can, all the liberty I can. Your hands, eyes, and ears shall hav fair play."

Two gentlemen now traveling in America, both lecturers on Spiritualism, should this meet their eyes, will remember lecturing in Preston, Lancashire, England. After the lecture was over, a few questions were allowed to be asked. Here are the questions and the answers. These questions put the lecturers hors de combat:

"Is Mr. Colliville now under spirit control?"

"Yes."

"Can your control hear and see me without your eyes and ears?"

"Yes."

"Will you please turn your back to the audience and tell how many fingers I hold up?"

"No."

The confusion, shouting, and laughter that followed this answer can be better imagined than described.

The other trance lecturer, in the same town, was questioned at the close of his lecture in this fashion :

"Will Mr. Walker say whether he is now under the control of the spirit of Mungo Park or not ?"

"I am under the control of Mungo Park."

"Can your control hear and see what I am doing without your bodily organs ?"

"Yes."

(I was standing close to the lecturer.)

"I will now put my thumbs in your ears and my fingers upon your eyes, and I will talk to the spirit of Mungo Park."

"Oh, that is clairvoyance, and I am not a clairvoyant.'

I replied : "Nothing of the kind. I know what clairvoyance professes to be. I will put my question in such a form that any one can see whether Spiritualism is true or false. I will put it so plain that the most obtuse can see. As your control can hear without your ears and see without your eyes, let your control, Mungo Park, relinquish control and stop here beside me. You go into the anteroom, and while you are there I will talk to your control ; then come you back and let Mungo Park take control and answer my questions."

Mr. Walker said that was mind-reading and clairvoyance. I withdrew, because that answer was the cause of turning the meeting into a bear garden and stopping his next lecture.

Spiritualists foolishly carry the war into the Materialist camp. They are justified in doing so whenever they can, but let it be carried logically. To ask a Materialist to prove that man has no soul, is asking too much ; because a man can not be expected to prove that a thing does not exist which does not exist. If a soul does not exist, no amount of proof will prove hat it does not exist. The proof is so self-evident that no amount of proof can make it more plain. But if a soul does exist, then it can be proved to exist.

The proof lies with him who says a soul does exist. The proof of existence goes first. No one can be expected to prove that a soul is not until some one has attempted to prove that a soul does exist. No one can say no until some one has said yes.

The new germ theory of soul contains so many errors founded upon fancies. The fancies are very plausibly arranged. The errors are not noticed, the belief hides all the folly. The germ theory of soul says that the soul develops the body—develops the physical cripple, the mental cripple, such as the insane and the idiot.

The soul germ progresses from the mineral, through the vegetable, then through the souls of other forms before it makes the sane man, the insane man, and the idiot. What proof is given for this germ theory of spirit ? The only proof is table-rapping mediums and trance speakers. If the soul germ can progress upwards from the mineral, it retrogrades backwards to the mineral. If there was ever a time when the soul germ had no identity, there will come a time when it will lose its identity. Souls are matter, refined matter, subject to the physical laws of matter. Souls are organized, subject to the organic laws of matter. Therefore they are born and will die. Germ souls are born through thousands of births until they reach man, then they eat, sleep, faint, get drunk. Here one is lost to know whether it is the body eats other soul germs, or if it is the soul that eats up so many soul germs to "build up its soul."

What sleeps, the body or the soul ? If the body, is the soul awake ? If so, how so ?

If the soul sleeps, then it can die—sleep is death's sister.

Is it the body that faints ? If so, what is the soul doing while the body is in the faint ?

If it is the soul that faints, then it will die. A faint is the mother of death.

When the soul drinks a glass of beer, it is a strange, bitter article. That the soul should feel so very queer with taking so few germ particles. CHARLES AUDLEY.

ROMANISM IS MATERIALISM.—With no disposition to make out a case, I must say if Romanism means to maintain that religion should not be isolated from life and confined in a church, but extended to all teaching and training, no church on earth so grossly commits as does the Roman the very sin it arraigns. It calls Protestant instruction godless, and declares there is no religion in our schools ; but of all churches the Romish in chief is the one which confines religion to ceremony and hardens it into form. It compresses its most precious third part of a deity bodily into a wafer, to be put on the tongue. That is the doctrine of transubstantiation. It abounds in graven images, in saints and virgins, in stone and paint. Picture or statue has its place, but the old law is violated whenever aught divine in heaven, of which no veritable image exists, is ignorantly and profanely represented on canvas or marble on earth. Of God and the godlike no engraving or color can be made, or should be put instead. Romanism is Materialism in the temple. It is an unspiritual faith. Take away its appeal to the senses, to the eye, in vast architecture and elevation of the host and gilded cross ; to the ear, in organ or Gregorian chant ; to the papillary taste, in the elements which solemn muttering turns from bread and wine to flesh and blood ; to the smell in the incense, which musics so strangely with a fixed and not very pure or sweet cathedral odor, so different from the open air ; and to the touch, from the basin of holy water near the portal of the church and the curtained confessional, with faces meeting so close, hard by; and even in the paintings which I hav seen a worshiper handle with tearful ecstacy, as if they were compassionately alive ;—that is, take away the carnal and earthy symbolism from its sensuous influence and mortal hold, and take away coarse conceptions of angels and miracles, then what but a ghost of the splendid and appalling system were left ?—Dr. Bartol. [The whole sermon is worthy of careful perusal by all interested in education and our public schools.]

Attacking Free Speech.

Denis Kearney was arrested in San Francisco recently, fined $1,000, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for speaking his sentiments in public. We do not know what he said, and it is impossible to find out, for the Associated Press, which furnishes the news for the whole country, is a lying concern in the employ of capital, and interested in making all agitators of the labor question appear as odious as possible, therefore it will never be known in the East what Kearney really said. But it does not matter what he said. It is not in the power of any man to say anything against a government, or a system of public business, or a public policy, or a political party, that justly makes him liable to punishment either by fine or imprisonment. That Kearney has been arrested for expressing his sentiments in public is another of the outrages against free speech which are becoming so common that it is difficult to giv each case the attention which it deserves.

A certain self-exalted clique set themselves up as censors in this country, and declare that whatever expression does not conform to their empiric notion of right is necessarily wrong and must be punished. Now it is blasphemy, and they select certain words of the English language, and, placing their seal upon them, deny everybody except themselves the right to use those words on penalty of punishment by fine and imprisonment, or both; and Abner Kneeland goes to prison for refusing to recognize their right to govern his conscience through the medium of his tongue. Next it is obscenity, and they partition off a portion of the English language from all the rest and make it a punishable offense for everybody except themselves to use the language of his country as it suits his taste and convenience; and D. M. Bennett goes to prison for refusing to recognize their authority to dictate to him how many words he may use and in what connection. Last it is vulgarity and sedition, and the rascals hold another convention and decide among themselves that certain words, overlooked in the blasphemy and obscenity bull of excommunication, must be included under the new head, and Denis Kearney goes to prison for the crime of being vulgar and of criticising in vulgar language the abuses of the government under which he livs.

It is not Kneeland, nor Bennett, nor Kearney that we would defend—though we believe all of them worthy of honor for their personal bravery and fidelity to their convictions—but the great principle of free speech. The sacred right of discussion is getting to be violated altogether too frequently in a country where the very existence of the people's liberties depends upon absolute freedom of speech, without which freedom of opinion is worthless. This right needs to be defended everywhere and by everybody in these perilous times.

We hav laws against libeling individuals, and it is just that they sometimes be enforced, but it is a very different affair when the libel is against the government, the administration of public affairs, political mismanagement, or the adoption of a public policy. These are matters which every citizen has an inherent right to criticise and discuss, profanely, obscenely, vulgarly, or seditiously, as it pleases his conscience and suits his taste.

There is no safe ground for the people to take but this. The aristocrats, who hav so cleverly bagged their game in California, would sing a very different tune if Kearney should come into power and turn the tables on them by the exercise of the very same power to repress the expression of their sentiments that they exercise against him; but if they hav the right he has the right, and it is only a question of who has the power that decides who shall exercise the right.

It will not do, if we would preserve our liberties and protect the advocates of unpopular truth, to allow any set of men, however intelligent and however honest, to dictate to their fellow-men what sentiments are fit for publication and what are not. It will not do to trust the best men this country ever produced with the definition of blasphemy, if blasphemy is unlawful and a punishable offense, or to define obscenity or vulgarity under the same conditions. These are all matters of taste and individual opinion, and should be left free for each man's choice—should be left free or liberty is a farce. We are only safe when we sturdily insist that every fool shall hav the right to be foolish and every vulgar man the right to be vulgar, even to the folly of profanity or the vulgarity of obscenity, in print or wherever he can find listeners willing to giv him their satisfied attention. This alone will protect unpopular truth, which is always foolish or vulgar, generally profane, invariably dangerous, and sometimes obscene, as judged by the standards which custom and conservatism hav already erected.

Giv truth and error equal chance before a people educated as ours are by the blessed exercise of free speech, and he who fears the result may be put down every time as the man who livs or profits by error and desires to see it perpetuated. If the truth had not been on Kneeland's side his enemies would hav felt secure, and only laughed at his folly. If Bennett had not been guilty of publishing the truth he would not hav been punished for dealing in obscenity. If Kearney had been an unconscionable and vulgar liar the recoil of his lies on his own head would hav been considered his all-sufficient punishment. The imprisonment of Denis Kearney, on the pretext that there was danger in his talk, is the best evidence in the world that he talked the truth and performed a service for humanity by doing so ; but whether Kearney told the truth or not the fact is that it is becoming common in this country to imprison men for differing in their views from the majority of their fellow-citizens ; and this is an abomination which no liberty-loving people should submit to for a single hour.

The Good Work of Spiritualism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir : I was both surprised and grieved to read the letter of Charles J. Herbold in your issue of March 20th, in his uncalled-for attack on Spiritualism. It was unwise and decidedly injurious to the cause of Liberalism. I hav probably lived as long and seen as much of the effects of Spiritualism in its liberalizing efforts as Mr. Herbold has, and I hav no fear of successful intelligent contradiction when I say that it has done more in thirty years to break the bonds of sectarianism than Infidelity did in a hundred years. Who ever heard of a woman speaking in public on an equality with man until the advent of Spiritualism, excepting a few Abolitionists ? I freely confess that many foolish, weak words hav been spoken of Spiritual mediums, but I also know that grander words or more telling blows against old theology, and ten thousand more of them, hav been spoken by Spiritual mediums than ever were spoken by Infidels.

If Spiritualism is all Mr. Herbold says it is, and ten times worse, and even if it is not true that man has a conscious existence after death, even then it has done more to elevate humanity than any other Liberal power that ever came on this earth.

It is Spiritualism, and only Spiritualism, that has made it possible for such men as Ingersoll, Underwood, and others, to reach the people as they hav. Where is there a town in the free states, as they are called, but what has been Liberalized by Spiritual mediums. The work it has done in putting woman on the platform as the equal of man is enough to forever command the respect and admiration of all who desire to see the world free from sectarian bondage.

If it is a delusion, it is the grandest that ever came to man, for it has abolished the Christians' God, devil, hell, and heaven, and preached the doctrine of human brotherhood, and it never was preached by any other class of people, unless we except the old Abolitionists.

It is a serious mistake and source of a sectarian spirit to ignore the help of any class of Liberals, be they ever so humble, who are working for the elevation of humanity. And certainly none hav done more than Spiritualists hav.

R. C. Flower.

At a called meeting of the officers of the Independent Christian Church of Alliance, Ohio, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted :

WHEREAS, In the course of changes and events Dr. R. C. Flower, the former pastor of this church, has removed from our midst to the city of Philadelphia, Pa., where he is publicly engaged in the cause of free speech and free thought, and as the result of the intimate relation of pastor and officers of the church has existed from our first organization as a church to the present time (now about three years), we feel to say that we hav found in Mr. Flower a diligent student, an eloquent speaker, and a true friend. Therefore,

Resolved, That we lose in the removal of Mr. Flower a fearless and able champion in the cause of reform, and one who was never afraid to express his honest convictions, and who has through the press and from the platform earnestly dealt telling blows against error and superstition.

Resolved, That we earnestly commend Mr. Flower and his amiable wife to the kind consideration and love of the friends with whom they may, in their future labors, be associated with wherever they may be called in the discharge of the work that they may find to do.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Mr. Flower, and also to Mind and Matter, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the Alliance Standard for publication, and that a copy be spread on the records of the church.

"NATURE'S REVELATIONS OF CHARACTER; or, Physiognomy Illustrated," by the eminent lecturer on physiognomy, Dr. J. Simms, is a large octavo book of 624 pages, profusely illustrated, neatly bound in muslin, and sold at $3.50. Instead of temperament we read about "forms," and the classification is evidently, at first glance, very superior to the old "bilious" style. The entire body is taken into consideration in this new system of physiognomy. The doctor tells how character is indicated by bone, muscle, brain and nerves, abdomen and thorax. Hair, color, laugh, walk, hand-shaking, voice, and manner, are shown to express much that ordinary mortals hav heretofore been compelled to learn by experience only, and that very imperfectly. Here the gift and power is given to see ourselves and others in a true light. Facial expression is claimed to be the result of continued habits of thought and action, and not the cause of any mental trait, nor is the face or brain recognized as the seat of any faculty. Signs of character are more numerous and definite in the face, though some traits may be shown by any and all parts of the body. Large brains indicate great sensitiveness ; one who suffers and enjoys in the extreme, is easily depressed or elated, and pays great attention to details; do not indicate great mental ability. The secret of intellect is said to be in the equal proportion and strength of the various parts of man's entire structure. Large heads are found in cold climates, and the size decreases towards the equator ; this fact proves that climate has a greater influence in giving size to the head than all other causes. The best intellects are found between extremes in climate and with medium size of head. Hundreds of signs of character are given, many faculties hav been discovered and defined that hav heretofore been unrecognized, and all hav been named and formulated into a system. The principles of this interesting and useful science are so plainly set forth by the able author as to be easily understood by all, and the signs are so evidently apparent that it seems strange they never were before observed. The form of the ear denotes musical ability; the size and shape of the mouth tell of language. Eyes well shaded by forehead and eyebrows indicate close observers. Large noses betoken great activity and energy, etc.—Oregonian.

Letters from Friends.

PORTLANDVILLE, N. Y., Mar. 22, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Will some one of my scientifico-materialistic friends please explain the phenomenon of the following revelation? In the year 1865, and a few days before President Lincoln's assassination, there was a certain person living in the eastern part of this state to whom it was revealed in a vision or dream (or anything that the reader may choose to call it) that a plot had been formed for the assassination of President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton, and stating when it was about to take place; consequently said person, or a friend to that person, sent an invitation to Lincoln and Stanton, warning them of their danger, and inviting them to come to the state of New York and spend a few weeks, and thus thwart the plot and avoid the result. But they couldn't be prevailed upon to heed the warning.

Could it be possible that Abraham Lincoln, the bravest and most daring of men, who had been exposed to the hand and will of traitors on every side—a man that dared walk the streets of Washington the darkest night, and that without a body-guard, when hundreds within a stone's throw were thirsting after his loyal blood—a man so bold and fearless that he dared to ride through the streets of the rebel capital a few days after the surrender of Lee's army, exposed in the most careless manner, when thousands of his observers, beholding him with wonder and longing for revenge, could hav given him the secret bullet, and none would hav been the wiser for it; could it be possible that this man, who had been so frequently and unreservedly exposed to the mercy of his enemies for five long years of contestant warfare, and that without a scratch, and that, too, at a time when cannon were loudly booming through every loyal state in the Union, and heralding the good news of victory and the fall of secession, and crowning that man with a victor's crown of honor and glory; could it be that such a one was only reserved for the mean, contemptible pleasure of an assassin? Oh, yes; and Lincoln felt it too well. (I could tell you more right here.) Alas, that dark and terrible day arrived, and Lincoln, with something more than a common, but a calm, expression, walked to the martyr's stage, and there and then received the assassin's ball.

Poor, poor Lincoln! That conspicuous, gorgeous flower has dropped from the wreath of our glory! Oh, yes; the rebels' truest friend and the father of love and liberty had fallen!

"There may hav been a few hearts rife with joy,
But there were millions rent with grief."

Yours truly, PETER SOULE.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Mar. 24, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As the times hav been rather hard with me so far as finances are concerned, I hav been very negligent about paying my subscription; but the old adage, "Better late than never," I hope will apply in my case. Within please find five dollars, to apply to my subscription and help keep THE TRUTH SEEKER a booming, for it is the paper to rattle up the dry bones of the priests of this country, and I hav great hopes that when you are once free from those human vampires who wish to extract every drop of Freethought blood out of the civilized world you will make it as warm for them as they richly deserve. I am yours for the truth, JAMES S. FROST.

ALLIANCE, OHIO, Feb. 25, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: In renewing my subscription I would send greeting to the fraternity of Liberals and truth seekers, and especially to our worthy standard-bearer and his companion and assistants—those who most severely hav felt the heat and toil of battle, and hav fallen into the hands of the enemy, and are even now suffering in the power of the enemy as unjustly as did our brothers at Andersonville.

Do not doubt that noble hearts all over our broad land beat in sympathy for D. M. Bennett, when he is thus most unjustly persecuted and through him the cause of Freethought. Is it not a direct blow at the heart of our free institutions? Are not our sacred rights invaded? and should not those who stand on the side of freedom, as opposed to sectarian persecution—those who would preserve our country from the blighting effects of Christian intolerance and priestly rule—should they not stand firmly together as a band of warriors to repel the attacks of the foe? I am pained to see so much contention among those who hav a common enemy that stands menacingly before those who should receive all their spare ammunition. I think there is no cause for difference among the Liberals. If we do not see everything exactly alike, why need we put the worst possible construction upon the views of others?

Now, if Comstock can dry up the terrible stream of obscenity will we not all vote him a crown of honor? But from all I can learn that is not what he is trying to do, but only under that guise is he persecuting those who are the reformers and promoters of better morals—those who seek to find the cause of vice and to remove it.

"As the drop mingles with the surging ocean,
As the sand falleth on the sea-girt shore,
So shall a thought of truth, if put in motion,
Liv'mong other thoughts forevermore;
And as one globule doth displace another,
Moving old ocean with its tiring might,
So move our words a sister or a brother,
Swaying them in the paths of wrong or right."

Inclosed find post-office order for four dollars and fifty cents, three dollars of which is to renew my subscription and one dollar and fifty cents to pay for your paper six months to Curtis Goddard. Yours for the light of truth on all subjects, CLEMENT ROCKHILL.

DEWEYSVILLE, UTAH, March 20, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Hoping that you will allow me a little space in your paper, I will here, with these few lines, inform you and the many readers of your paper how we are prospering in this part of the renowned "Zion" of America. Like Zion of old, it is well stocked with prophets and priests of all manner of names and titles. Priestcraft is the greatest enemy that we hav to contend with here, still of course ignorance is the great supporter of the craft; but if the people could be left to their own judgment and common sense, free from the contaminating influence of the priests, they would be first-class both to liv and labor with for the progression of science and free thought. Still we are trying to keep the car of progress moving.

I was happy to see in the report of the Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues—in your issue of March 6th—that Utah has six Leagues. Six Liberal Leagues in twenty counties are not many. Still I know there is plenty of room for improvement. We ought to hav at least one Liberal League in every county. But what we are greatly in need of here is some good lecturer on science and mental liberty. I am sure that the Liberal ranks in Utah would be greatly increased. I hav myself traveled a good deal in several parts of this territory trying to introduce the principles of Freethought, or Infidelity, as they call it; and I am, therefore, acquainted a good deal with the spirit and feelings of the people where I hav traveled; and, as I said before, if the people could be left to their own judgment, free from priestly interference, we would soon see a great change in Utah. I will therefore say, as the good old hero Thomas Paine said in regard to the kingcraft of France, "Behead the priestcraft" of Utah, but not the priests. Surely it would be a redemption to Utah. You talk about sixty thousand priests in the United States. Bless your soul, I am almost sure we hav that number here in Utah alone. There are Melchisedec priests and Aaronic priests, high-priests and small priests; yes, priests of all grades and sizes; in fact, almost every male member of the Mormon church, from eight years old and upward, is a priest of some kind. And ever so small a fellow of this priestly gang will bark at truth. Yes, if ever a spot of this earth was cursed with priestcraft, it is Utah. Still I feel happy to state that priestcraft is losing its iron grasp to a great extent, thanks to science and civilization. The great Atlantic and Pacific Railroad was the first great redeemer for Utah.

Brigham Young said twenty years ago: "Before apostates shall come to flourish in these valleys of the mountains, I will unsheath my bowie-knife and with it conquer or die. I say to Jew or Gentile, keep your tongues still and let the people alone in these valleys of the mountains or you will find that which you were not looking for." And the most bloody and cruel deeds were perpetrated in these valleys of the Rocky Mountains under the cloak of religion.

I will here express my great joy and happy feelings to see in your paper of March 13th that our heroic friend's term of imprisonment expires on the 29th of next month, and that our friends and brothers of the National Defense Association hav taken steps to giv the brave old hero a grand reception. Most surely he deserves it. He served his unjust sentence as a martyr for the cause he loved.

And therefore I say, friends of freedom, who love freedom, physical and mental—freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and untampered mails, wherever you are, in Utah or elsewhere—let us all unite in this grand effort. Surely we cannot all afford to go to New York to meet face to face with our brave and noble martyr and brother. Allow me here to make a suggestion. Let each and every one of us help what little we can to defray the expenses, so that it may be a grand reception, so that our good old hero may see that he has friends yet who realize that he has suffered not for his own cause but for the cause we all love and cherish. Let each of us pay fifty cents toward this grand reception, and if we feel able pay more. I know none of you are poorer financially than myself, but I will pay my share; and let some of us exert our influence among our friends and get the money together, and hav it sent in time to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I shall do my part in this locality. I would suggest that we make this time—the 29th of April—a grand holiday for ourselves, that we may hav a grand time, when we can hav an opportunity to meet together and hav a few speeches and recitations, and, in fact, a good, social recreation for us, in honor of our brave old hero in this nineteenth century, and to the dishonor of a cowardly and fanatical President of the United States in 1880.

Friend D. M. Bennett is the hero in this great cause. No arch-devil in human shape can crush him. No, no! His cause is just, his mind free, and Richard is himself again. Look at his works even inside the gloomy prison-cell. Read his convention of the gods. It is the grandest thing I ever read. Ah, for a thousand Bennetts and Ingersolls! How the grim old fiend of humanity, Priestcraft, would hav to flee the country! and the glorious banner of freedom would then not be misnamed, as, to our sorrow, is the case to-day.

Your brother and fellow-laborer for human progress,
ANDREW LARSEN.

OGDEN, UTAH, Feb. 23, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I see in your paper of February 14th, under the heading of "Letters From Friends," one from R. G. Richardson, to whom I would like to offer a suggestion with the best of feelings, which, I hope, may be profitable to him and some others.

Now, my friend Richardson, allow me to ask you why it is that you will giv offense to brethren in the cause of freedom of thought and speech, united, as we are, or as we should be, in the grand work of universal liberty and bound together in the Liberal League movement, having one and the same object in view—the release of Liberals of every kind and denomination from the yoke of bondage, mentally and physically, by which we are ground down and deprived of our rights to think and speak, bequeathed to us by the Constitution of our country? Do you not know that we are too weak to attack the monster single-handed? And as your Malthusian views (I think) hav the least adherents of any other party in opposing the great orthodox powers, you, of all others, ought to save your offensive epithets for another purpose rather than risk the turning of any from the great work in hand, and now particularly the Spiritualists, who, I think, will outnumber any other class of Liberals now engaged in the work.

Do you not know that in this union of Liberals we agree in effect to bid our private and pet schemes lie dormant while we are engaged in one general warfare against a common enemy in a death-struggle for our common and equal rights? Why then find fault with your brother in the struggle? Can your party, alone and unaided by others, accomplish the great work in hand? Do you want freedom of thought and speech to propagate your views? If you do, and if you are in earnest, just sit down alone and work out a little strategy. Ask yourself the question, How can I work out my freedom and hav the liberty that is my right to propagate my views of reform? My party is not strong enough to demand and obtain those rights. If I attempt to giv utterance to them under the present opposition by the orthodox power, I will surely be pronounced obscene, and may find myself minus my liberty even to walk the streets, my purse less about five hundred dollars, and my body and soul behind the bars for thirteen months or longer, with the privilege of propagating my pet schemes through the gratings of a prison window to an assemblage of stones, bricks, and mortar of orthodox argument against all reform subjects. This I shall find not very refreshing while resting from a hard day's work making shoes or turning a treadmill.

I must not forget Mr. Bennett's present situation nor the persecution of my Malthusian friends in England. Obscenity takes a wide range of meaning by the orthodox lexicon Well, I think I hear you ask, What shall I do? Why, just hum over a tune, beat time to it with the tips of your fingers on your forhead. Nothing yet? Then scratch your head, and if your skull is not thicker than mine or as bare of perception inside as it ought to be of workers on the outside, I will venture a guess that you will feel or hear a suggestion that will solve the problem. Help! union! allies! Now say you, "I hav it. I will form an alliance with Freethinkers and Spiritualists and all others who are opposed to the orthodox usurpation of power, and we will hav an army that will enable us to obtain our equal rights."

Now, my dear brother, if we can only let our pet schemes lie dormant long enough, hidden down deep under the elements of union in the Liberal League movement, and work together with a full purpose of equal rights and liberties for all on that platform, we will most assuredly gain a full and complete victory.

Having accomplished that purpose of our union, and having established the broad basis of equal rights, we can then unearth our pet schemes and advocate our special principles, political, religious, or social, without the fear of the old arguments of orthodoxy or conservatism when in power, which has ever been the scaffold, the torch, or the prison.

Now, as we do not love blood or cruel torture as well as our Christian opponents do, we will try to gain a bloodless victory; and if we will only down with self and up with the standard of equal rights, and quit offending our brother; if we will work with a will, shoulder to shoulder, united, heart and hand, in the use of the ballot, we will in a short time hav established the platform of the Liberal League, and send proudly to the masthead the banner of equal rights for all to float to every breeze, side by side with the Stars and Stripes over the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Now, my good Bro. Richardson, I do not wish to offend you, but hope, by reminding you of your inconsistency, I may do you good, and perhaps some others of our Liberal brethren may take a gentle hint.

I am a Spiritualist, and one of the strongest and most determined in the cause of equal rights, Malthusian as well as Spiritualist, and every other, not excepting the rights of the Mormon brotherhood, whom I know better than many others do, and I can afford to stop or bow and let your barbed arrows fly over my head (if they hit some other Spiritualist, that I can't help); neither shall I fly the track if some kind brother should try to trip me while I am pursuing the enemy. I must, however, remind you of what you say in your letter: "I wish to speak of Spiritualists, ex-reverends, etc.;" and you add, "As to Spiritualism, I know but little about it, only what I hav learned from your paper." And afterwards you say you "think the howl about obscenity comes mostly from Spiritualists." Now, as Spiritualism is something that you do not know anything about (you only think), why do you think so loud that thousands can hear you and many may be offended? If the Spiritualists are not as you think them, you must see that you hav given offense without cause. And if they in return would think of you in like manner, in your demand for books teaching the Malthusian doctrine, they too might think loud enough to offend all your party. If we persist in carrying out such party feelings, with such thinking, we will so thin our ranks that we will never accomplish the general desire of the whole.

Next, you are thinking too loud about the "ex-reverends;" and not only think, but call them "ignorant and stupid," and say much more about them, as well as about the Spiritualists, that is untrue and uncalled for. Whom do you mean by "ex-reverends?" Are you so "stupid and ignorant" that you do not know that your expression includes all the gentlemen of that class who hav been bold enough to brave the opposition and sacrifice a good permanent salary for the cause of truth? In the name of truth, do not, my good brother, think so loudly and talk so untruthfully about some of our best and most sacrificing helpers and brothers in the good work. If there are any "ex-reverends" or Spiritualists who hav deserved your loud thinking and speaking, hav the moral courage to name them (or, better still, stop your thinking till the victory is won), and do not slander, by these means, all who are known by these titles.

Allow me to refer you to my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 14th, page 43, for further advice; and please read your own letter in the issue of the 14th inst., and at the same time cast your eye on the letter above yours, in the same column, of Grace L. Parkhurst, and see what she says about Spiritualists, and then think about yourself and your want of proper or right thinking when you wrote that letter, and Believe me your sincere friend,

JOHN A. JOST.

ROCKPORT, MO., March 19, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find two dollars to apply on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was a trial subscriber to begin with, but I don't think I can get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER, at least not until Mr. Bennett's time in prison expires. I think his imprisonment by our boasted free and republican government is an outrageous shame, and a cruel, heartless wrong. I would like to know who among us is safe from prosecution if we utter and publish our honest thoughts. I tell you that there is a latent power in this land, if fully developed and brought to the front, that would change all this, and make this indeed a free country in the broadest sense of the term, and men would no longer cringe beneath the frowns of Christian intolerance and bigotry.

There are a great many people here that believe in free thought, free speech, and free mails, but they fear ostracism in a business point of view, and socially and politically also, and they keep mum as a matter of policy. I want to see the day come when we can be our honest selves, and speak and publish our honest opinions without fear of prosecution, persecution, or ostracism. If it ever comes, we will hav a grand national and free jubilee. Hoping that Mr. Bennett will come out of prison well and hearty, and full of Liberal views, I am,

Your most obedient servant, G. G. BECK.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., March 17, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Find inclosed post-office order for $4.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Send to J. L. York, San Jose, Cal. It is a little more than is now due; please giv credit and accept our heartfelt sympathies. With you we hav counted the months and now the weeks, and soon it will be only days to count before our noble brother and worker for human rights will again take his place amongst us. We hope to soon see him again in his office and with his family. How often I hav looked into his prison, through the door opened by THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sympathized with him and you!

Please accept the best wishes of myself and husband.

MRS. J. L. YORK.

LEAVENWORTH, IND., March 22, 1880

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Thirty-eight days more and you will be shaking hands with your numerous friends, happy day for them as well as yourself. The days and nights seem long to me since your incarceration. The old TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly, is read with admiration by myself and family. The convention of the gods made me laugh outright; it made me forget all my troubles.

I send my best wishes to the old hero and all interested in that firm. Yours for truth, O. W. HANNUM.

SUNDAY CELEBRATION.—CHURCH TAXATION.—CO OPERATION.

ROSENBERG FLA.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: My countrymen in Newark made a declaration of rights on the League some time since that suggests ideas for solving the questions indicated in the heading of this article. If practical giv them a space.

Since our Christian friends insist on celebrating the Sunday according to their notion, let us for the sake of peace comply with their desire. The Germans hav in every city and almost every town a meetinghouse, called "turner hall," and where not, they might rent a house, call it their church, temple, synagogue, etc., and hold their meetings there, conforming as close as possible to the sacred rites of the Christian and other sects. If our opponents fancy the necessity of having the members called to the meeting by the ring of a bell, a big cow-bell might answer. The friends hav to appoint either one of their number, or, as it might happen, have a traveling "evangelist" to "lead them in prayer." The "service" has to consist in singing, sometimes accompanied by music, in a sermon on scientific, social, hygienic, or other important matters conducive to the welfare of the human race, "confessions of experience," i. e., discussions are in order on all questions the times may suggest. Of course the "love feast" has to be administered in a good lunch and lager beer. And as the times are wicked and are steadily getting worse, according to the statement of our truthful orthodox friends, because religion is decaying, I urge my countrymen to keep their temple open at every hour of the day for the reception of "erring sinners," and to hold "revival meetings" every evening. Playing cards there publicly might be objectionable to our friends on the other side, and ought to be omitted from the holy performance. Don't hurt their feelings. They are powerful and revengeful, and their "religion of love and good will toward all men" might compel them to cast you into the dungeon. Of course guests are always welcome in the house of worship.

Now, friends, if you turn the whole affair this way and claim exemption from taxation as long as it is granted to other religious sects, nobody will annoy you in your devotions. The host of the meeting-house will also be free from taxes as the dispenser of the holy victuals. As a matter of course you will be always ready to continue paying taxes for the property devoted to the divine service as soon as the other sects submit to equality before the law. Friends, commence at once to carry it out; and if you are established as a religious congregation, who could prevent you from holding picnics and camp meetings on week and Sundays with or without entrance fees, just as the other sects are doing.

This seems to me the shortest and surest way for compelling the churches to bear their share in the burden of taxation, and there has to be done something for this end and soon, as the accumulation of property in the dead hand is going on rapidly with some abominations, and if they continue in that way for fifteen years longer, half of the real estate will be in the hands of religious sects that shift their proper share of taxes upon productive property, which has a better claim for exemption as it conveys blessing to the human race; but still worse, this huge church property might in some future time be used in combination with the monyed aristocracy and the monopolists to "stamp out Freethought."

Another suggestion: As long as church property is exempt from taxation, would it not be advisable for Liberals to deed their property to some Liberal congregations, for instance, the Church of Humanity in New York, or to the Liberal League when incorporated? Save the taxes and spend them for propagating our cause, just as other sects are doing. If it is feasible, will one of our members versed in the law make out a form of deed and publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I for one will carry out the suggestion.

In reading the letters from friends in our beloved TRUTH SEEKER, we find in at least half of them the complaint, "I would if I could." It is heart-sickening but true. Now, can we, through our organ, THE TRUTH SEEKER, not do something to promote the physical welfare of our community? Suppose THE TRUTH SEEKER might devote but one column to the dissemination of useful information, answering questions of a practical nature, accommodating employment-seeking Liberals, etc., methinks it would benefit a great many of our members, would furnish them the means for spreading Freethought, disseminating the eye-opening tracts, etc, and at last pay fully for that little space occupied in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Now, to make this idea practical, I propose to manufacture orange butter and send it to members of our League in the North to sell it there, and to start gradually a business there in this article as well as in Southern fruits. Those who are inclined to take hold of this offer may inquire for particulars. If others hav other propositions to make, let us hear and accept them if we can be mutually benefited by it. This exchange between North and South, East and West, will furnish a powerful tie for all the Liberals over the Union. Sincerely yours, KARL ENGLER.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., March 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As a matter of course, I hav long ago chosen to take the "none-in-mine." However, I like to read the best shots from both batteries, and accustom myself to the best tactics of mental warfare, for I predict a powerful conflict in the near future mentally, and I fear physically. The latter I hope can be avoided. If it be required, in order to throw off the ecclesiastical burden, it will hav to come. "Giv us liberty or death," should be the watchword of every true Liberal. WM. A. THOMPSON.

CHAMPLIN, MINN.

MR. EDITOR: There is not a more hopeful sign of the success of the Infidel and Liberal cause in our country than is seen in the increasing number of female writers in the columns of the "Friendly Correspondence" of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is almost beyond contradiction that where a woman is found having a liberal share of intelligence, and is a general reader, not alone of light stuff but solid intellectual material, she has a natural leaning to the side of Infidelity. It is not easy to over-estimate woman's strength, when properly applied, in breaking this environment of superstition and theological fanaticism that predominate in the neighborhood of churches. It is generally admitted that women are the chief workers in the church, and that they work not only for the strength of its membership, but in furnishing their meeting-houses with their proper outfit such as carpets, lamps, organ, and vocal music, etc. These objects are frequently attained by their labor and skill in getting up church attractions in the shape of ten-cent suppers, church festivals, to which is added little games of chance, and often they are personally called on to go round on a petty collecting tour for the support of their minister. But these late efforts to maintain the church are evidences of its weakness, and even signs of its dissolution, for if there were anything substantial, anything real, or anything to make character and to promote the love of humanity in it, it should stand upon its own merits. When the truths in Infidelity, through the channels of education, hav reached those workers in the church, when they will hav found their true and noble sphere at home as mothers, in teaching their children the first lessons of simple truths as they are found in nature, and the love of humanity in practical deeds in place of theological fables, then will speedily approach the end of another heathen religion, the religion of false Christianity.

J. KINSER.

WAUSAU, WIS, March 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Honored Sir: I hav read your last letter from the Christian bastile at Albany, and it gladdened my heart to hear that your heath is better. I hav been very anxious to hear from you regarding your health, as I know the pressure must be hard on you, being old and shut up from your family and friends—even if the institution you are in is a Christian one. But the time is swiftly passing on, and within three months you will be a free man. And I hope that virtuous young man Comstock will let you alone—and everybody else that is pursuing his legitimate business, although their religious views may be contrary to the president's and secretary's of the Young Men's Christian Association.

I see by your letter that the Christian fraud in the President's chair has again promised to let you out and backed down again, which is another proof that he is a moral fraud. It is a good thing for the American people that he is not seeking a renomination, but will retire to obscurity and oblivion as the most good-for-nothing president there has been elected in this country. I am only sorry that it was my bad luck to vote for him; but I will promise upon my sacred honor not to vote a Republican ticket again while I liv, as I believe that party is morally dead. And my vote shall in the future be cast with the young and prosperous Greenback party of reform and liberty.

What I intended to write about was the new book you are getting out. I want a copy of that, and J. P. Larson, a reader and admirer of your paper, wishes me to tell you that he wants one, and as soon as it is published we shall forward the money to your office.

Hoping that this will find you in good health, I remain,
Yours for truth, S. JOHNSON.

GARDNER GROVE, CAL, March 15, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office money order for three dollars for subscription to your paper. I value the paper very much, and hope it will grow in popularity in the future as it has in the past. Myself and family sympathize with you in your persecution and unjust imprisonment. We hav plenty of bigots and fanatics here who declare that unbelief in the Bible ought to be punished. The Christian Advocate is their prompter, but there are a large number of Freethinkers here also to combat them.

I would like to be one of the procession to meet you at the expiration of your term of imprisonment and escort you to your home with the Stars and Stripes trailing in the dust and a badge of mourning in the place of the flag.

Yours for truth and justice, JAMES S. DEMING.

HAMBURGH, N. Y., March 17, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Knowing you to be a firm friend of the progress of freedom of thought, and hoping that you could find space in your paper, I thought I would inform the outside world of the state of affairs in the village of Hamburgh. For the past three months the people in this vicinity hav been in a perfect uproar of excitement caused by the conduct of a Methodist divine, who is carrying on a series of revivals at the M. E. church.

The "much beloved" pastor is an Englishman, and has rushed things forward with all the bull-headedness characteristic of a Johnny Bull. Not only has said pastor been trying to convert people, but he has used his tongue to such an advantage that he has preached his choir out of the church, and the majority of people hav become disgusted with him and his modus operandi.

Among the converts there is a young lady. Not long since, a party was held at a private house, and during the evening the young lady in question participated in the dancing. At the next meeting the boss gospel-slinger gave a tirade against dancing, commenting on the party thusly: "A party held at the house of so-called respectable people." "Waltzing in the arms of worthless profligates," etc.

The family at whose house the party was held are among the most respectable people in town, and none but respectable people were present. Furthermore, there are quite a number of Freethinkers in this place, and great is the wailing and gnashing of teeth among them, for they hav had their doom sealed. The lamb-like pastor has predicted their removal within the coming year, and has prayed for their removal. Does this show a Christian spirit? Such a man is more fit to be a cattle-driver than a minister of the gospel in a civilized community.

Of course all church-members and religious fanatics uphold him in his course. To see a lot of persons going forward on the "anxious" seat and falling on their knees and groaning and shouting, when they are known to be the most vile of hypocrites, is disgusting in the extreme; but such is the case, and who can wonder that people are disgusted with them and also with a pastor who maliciously slanders respectable people? A FREETHINKER.

MONTREAL, March 20, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I was a subscriber to your paper from its first number until four years ago, when I was obliged to travel for my health. Since then I hav been unfortunate and not able to pay for the paper, yet through the kindness of friends I hav had the privilege of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER until last December, when I moved to this city, where I cannot find a single copy of it, and I want it the worst way, particularly to know what has become of the hero of humanity, D. M. Bennett. Please send me a few numbers, and as soon as there is the least change in my fortunes, I will pay. In the mean time I will try to get a few subscribers—a few, I say, because this city is the most adverse to reason and common sense of any I hav known, and I hav seen the best part of America.

It may not be amiss to giv you a concise description of the city for the benefit of your readers.

I hav not examined its records, but from personal observation I judge its population to be about 150,000 reckoned as follows: White-neckties, 500; black-gown-wearers, 1,000; gospel sufferers, 35 000; priest-ridden miserables, 113 500; total, as I said, 150,000.

The gospel class is very much like that you hav in the United States, but the priest-ridden portion is very peculiar. It is composed of men and women of all ranks, but all equally pious, fanatic, submissive to the absurd rules of the church, and opposed to common sense and human understanding. They draw a straight line between divine and worldly affairs. In the former they strictly adhere to the rules laid down by the priest, and in the latter they are guided by natural instinct. Soul and body are two separate and distinct parts of the human being, consequently they all confess their sins and pass Jesus Christ through their bowels at least once a year, but none of them hav the least respect for truth and justice except in cases where it is the most remunerative in pecuniary or other personal advantages. None of them would eat meat on a Friday or in Lent, but scarcely any of them will scruple to drink whisky in profusion any day in the year. They must all go to church on Sunday and hear mass, but the majority of them know the way to the back door of some house of dissipation, where they repair after divine service to gratify their lust in spite of the Ninth Commandment of their chief boss not to do so.

By the way, the priests of Montreal hav instituted a new thing that comes very handy to young folks particularly. They manufacture profusions of low masses early Sunday where the fidels can go and fulfil their duty towards God in a hurry and then hav the whole day to spend in more agreeable company.

Last, but not least, Montreal is supplied with two remarkably good sets of beggars; one is composed of friars and nuns, begging in the name of the poor, whom they do assist more or less on condition that they think and say as they do, but first supplying themselves with stone houses, plenty to eat, drink, and wear, good horses and carriages, and all the money they can spend.

The other set is composed of all men, women, and children, who must be very numerous, as their average call at any one house of the city is twenty-five a day. They assail in the name of God, which authority I question very much, because I hav right in my sight and hearing a good sample of them, approved as a good family, well deserving alms, and, in fact, receiving from some charitable institution a weekly allowance of food and fuel. Their life is very regular in its way. They rise at 9 A M. The old man immediately proceeds to turn the young ones out on the street to beg. The mother and the oldest daughter receive visitors who bring a bottle of narcotic to quiet the old man's nerves. At 9 P M. the last visitors depart, after which the old man and old woman quarrel and fight, good to the edification of the little ones, then they pray an hour, and retire to their virtuous beds and sleep in the Lord.

Yours truly, CANADIAN.

NELSON, IND, Feb. 25, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches us with the regularity of the rising sun. It is ever a welcome visitor laden always with splendid mental alimentation. Every member of my family is glad when the day comes for the arrival of our favorite paper.

I rejoice that your term of unjust Christian imprisonment is nearly ended. I hav often thought, with grief and sorrow, of you, in your lonely cell in that Christian bastile, confined for no cause in the world, except that you did not believe in that great fraud, Christianity, and had the honesty and manhood to say so. Your imprisonment is a disgrace to our country, a foul blot on the civilization of the 19th century. I hope you will be the last man imprisoned for opinion's sake in this country. That superlative scoundrel and sneak Anthony Comstock, though he succeeded, with the help of the orthodox, bigoted, and perjured Benedict, to place you "Behind the Bars," failed in his main object, which was to crush THE TRUTH SEEKER. You hav many enemies among the clergy and in the churches who would gladly keep you in prison during your whole life, many of them, doubtless, would rejoice exceedingly to see you burnt at the stake.

Now, while you hav many Christian enemies, you hav also many friends, devoted friends, among the Liberals, who are generally the best people in the community where they liv. They are also the best educated. Infidels and Atheists are almost without exception men and women of education, reflection, and sense. The illiterate and ignorant are always superstitious and of such the churches are mostly built up. I was one of the favored five thousand to whom Abbot sent his foul batch of lies and slander. The only effect it had on my mind was to produce a feeling of commiseration and contempt.

Your last letter is splendid. I approve and compliment you for your masterly communication on the late speech of the Rev. H. Crosby, at the annual meeting of the Society for the Propagation of Vice and Crime. Inclosed please find $4 50, for which send me Greg's "Creed of Christendom;" the balance place to my credit for your paper.

Respectfully, JOHN POINDEXTER.

GLENVILLE, O, March 17, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find one dollar for THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months. You are good in sending the paper after pay has run out, but you lose nothing, as my paper runs the gauntlet to different parts of the country and several hav subscribed. Like the friends, that I hav noticed by their letters hav THE TRUTH SEEKER for their Bible, so do I. I am a workingman, and it is about all I can do to make both ends meet, but I will try and squeeze out one dollar every four months. Now, hoping my friend Bennett will be released soon, with love and respect, I remain, Yours truly, N. PHILLIPS.

ASTORIA, OR., March 3, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I send inclosed some money. I think I hear you say, "That's good; you ought to hav sent it before." That's true and I am sorry; in proof thereof, here it is.

What I want to say is, Will not Bro. Bennett, not now but when it is more convenient, make a tour of the states and come as far west as Oregon, so that we may all see the man who has suffered for truth's sake. I hope at least 1,000 men and women will go to meet him when he is liberated, with a brass band to play, "See the conquering hero comes," "A man's a man for a' that," and "There's a good time coming boys." Let us show the world we can stick to our man in trouble.

Fraternally yours, A. A. CLEVELAND.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

D. M. BENNETT, Publisher, 141 Eighth St., N.Y.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL CIRCULAR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER writes: "Mr. Slenker has been under his (Dr. Fellow's) care for some months; is being treated by him for partial deafness and chronic catarrh, both of which infirmities seem gradually yielding to the doctor's remedies. There is no warmer friend to progress and mental freedom among all the readers of our beloved TRUTH SEEKER than good Dr. Fellows, and if you are afflicted with any of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to, I hope you will one and all giv our Liberal friend an opportunity to make you well again—to render the physical casket a fit receptacle for the jewel of the mind, which is THE ALL that makes us what we are and renders us worthy of the love, admiration, and respect of our kind."

Issues of the Age.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone, Assyria, Sir H. It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Right of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15 00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Oat., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools: the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. ## ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Six Lectures on Astronomy.

Examination of their Doctrines.

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and "Biography of Satan."

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Revelations of Antichrist

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The book contains 446 pages, with a very full Index and table of contents. Price, $200.

THE ROOT OF THE MATTER.

SAMSON:

A Myth-Story of the Sun.

The Gospel of the Kingdom According to the Holy Men of Old.

The author of these works finds the Bible largely mythical in its character. He presents us a number of copies to be disposed of in the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER. All who purchase will therefore aid THE TRUTH SEEKER to the amount of their purchase, or add to the Bennett fund as they may choose.

Samson, 20 cents; Gospel of the Kingdom, vols., each, 30 cents.

Gems of Thought.

In every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him.—Acts x, 35.

Can any amount of right feeling save a Bible-reader from putting into it a narrow and misleading sense if he discredits the reason that God has given him?—Christian Register.

Here's freedom to him that wad read,
Here's freedom to him that wad write!
There's nane ever feared that the truth should be heard
But they wham the truth wad indite.
—Burns.

"Where were you born?" said an English bishop to Summerfield, the Methodist preacher. "In Dublin and Liverpool," he answered. "Were you born in two places?' said the bishop. "Art thou a master in Israel and knowest not those things?" replied Summerfield.—J. F. Clarke.

The religious demand of to-day is religious truth and men who dare speak it. Better that the truth should sever the church than that a lie should be told to keep it together. If the truth should prove everything that we now hold holy and sacred to be really false and base, we must still say, "Let us hav the truth."—L. K. Washburn.

Readers who hav partaken of the rich spiritual treasures in George Macdonald's novels cannot forget that touching description in Robert Falconer of the Presbyterian widow writhing over the thought of hell for her cast-away son, and crying, in the agony of her despair, "O Lord, I canna say, Thy will be done! But dinna lay it to my chairge; for, gin ye were a mither yersel, ye widna pit him there."—Waters.

It is not a form of Christianity that is now in question. It is not a question between sects. It is a question which involves Christianity itself, and the authority of the Bible. Have we a divine religion at all? Is Christianity anything better than Buddhism or of any higher authority? If the Christian optimist supposes that these questions are to be met and decided by the "pooh-pooh" of sectaries, or the dicta of professional teachers, or the resolutions of conferences and councils, he is very much mistaken. —Holland.

My name is Fun—your cronie dear,
The nearest friend ye hae;
An' this is superstition here,
An' that's hypocrisy.
I'm goin' to Machline holy fair
To spend an hour in daffin;
Gin ye'll go there, you rankled pair,
We will get famous laughin'
At them this day.
—Burns.

We have come to evil days—days when public men, who stand forth as members of the Christian church, even of the churches called orthodox, hesitate not to carry in the same heart a salvation by faith and a willingness to receive bribes. Among the public men now [1873-4] charged with glaring dishonor there may be some who can establish innocence; but the awful fact is everywhere confessed that there are thousands of Christians who are getting their salvation by faith and their fortunes by rascality.—David Swing.

To heresy we are indebted for a large portion of our civil and religious liberty. Even the wild fanaticism and coarse plebeian progress

"Of petulant, capricious sects
The maggots of corrupted tombs"— all contributed to the attainment of the liberty that modern society enjoys. Sovereigns and states found it necessary to connive at heresy; connivance led to toleration, and toleration has been gradually developed into full liberty of thought.—Duke of Somerset.

If a truth be found in the last pamphlet thrown from the press, it is sacred. Whether an untruth be found in the Old Testament of the Jews or in the New Testament of the Greeks, it is unreliable. Whether Moses or Pope Urban declared the earth to be immovable, it is false. No lips can pronounce a falsehood and make it truth. No book can make that holy which is vile. No place can sanctify crime, and the shameful debaucheries of a Borgia or a Hildebrand in the palace of a pope are as black in the eyes of justice as the orgies nightly celebrated in the dens of Paris or Boston.—L. K. Washburn.

But this question about the creation being settled, other questions arise in their turn. Are all mankind descended from one pair or from many? Has the human race existed on the earth only six thousand years or during a longer period? Was the deluge of Noah a real event? and, if so, was it universal or partial? Did the sun stand still at the command of Joshua? or is that only a poetic image taken from an ancient book of poems—the book of Jasper? Is there any truth in the story of the passage of the Red Sea? of the Jordan? of the valley of Jericho? of Samson? Jonah? etc., etc.—J. F. Clarke.

"Miss Powle said I was as bad as Esau. You know what Esau did, don't you, pa? But she said Billy was a mean boy, and she made him giv me back the comforter. I couldn't giv him back the pasty, for I'd eaten it. Did God make Jacob giv back Esau's birthright? If Billy was mean, Jacob was mean, too, wasn't he?" argued the lad. "You musn't argue about your Bible, Jack. You must read it and ask no questions." "Ah, but there's a book we learn out of—'Bible Questions;' so you see we may ask questions about the Bible." "Proper questions, of course, Jack, such as are printed in books; those may be asked. But you musn't mix up Billy Blake and Jacob; that's wicked." "Oh," said Jack, gravely acquiescent, "then I'll read the Bible and try not to think about what I've read for fear I should mix up things."—Miss Braddon.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

In fine, there is much that is noble about him. —The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

Vol. 7. No. 15. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, April 10, 1880. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A SALT LAKE sign: "Holiness to the Lord! Zion's Co-operative Institution—Wholesale Liquor Dealers."

Truth would like to see Rev. Dr. John Hall's bank account on one hand and the recording angel's tally of his services on the other.

THE Fenians hav held a convention in Philadelphia. They want two million dollars with which to begin operations against England.

A BABY came to a family in Maine last week, and a bright five-year-old brother, patting it playfully under the chin, inquired, "Say, how was God when you left?"

MME. BLAVATSKY and her fellow theosophists are no longer subject to the espionage of the police in the cities of India. At first they were followed wherever they went. The government finding that they had no designs against the welfare of India, withdrew the watch greatly to the relief of the pilgrims.

THE Rev. Ellis F. Biscoe, of Arlington, N. J., was expelled by the Newark Conference for immorality. The charge was seducing Miss Leonard, and then sending her improper medicines to destroy the fruits of their guilty intimacy. The committee appointed to examine into the matter found that the charge was amply sustained.

THE Rev. H. Walter Miller, an Anglican vicar in Richmond, England, laid down a pretty stiff proposition to his parishioners previous to Easter. He declared that "the man who does not receive the holy communion at Easter-tide dishonors Jesus Christ, breaks the law of the church, forfeits the name of Christian, starves his own soul, and brings himself into danger of damnation." Is that all it does, Walter?

SOME godless fellow in Philadelphia played an April fool joke with the Bible used for swearing on at the Central Police Court in that city. He removed the inside from the covers and glued in the printed portion of a dictionary. The prank was not discovered until a large number of oaths had been sworn on the volume. An investigation is in process, with a view to ascertain how many oaths hav been taken since the book was tampered with.

THE term of imprisonment, which a species of bigots peculiar to the East, but entirely unknown in the enlightened West, imposed upon Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will expire on the 27th of April. His friends are preparing to giv him a grand reception on his return to New York. From a religious standpoint, the imprisonment of Mr. Bennett was a great blunder—it has made tens of thousands of Liberals.—Cloude County Blade.

THE Dundee Free Presbytery, Scotland, hav, by a vote of fifteen to thirteen, adopted an overture to the General Assembly recognizing the hand of God in the Tay Bridge disaster, and asking the Assembly to devise means for removing temptation to Sunday traveling and traffic. One speaker said that he regarded the disaster as a judgment of God upon mercantile trickery in building a bad bridge. Scotland's religion is a very nice variety. Knox need not be ashamed of his followers.

A CLERGYMAN who had been traveling in a remote part of the West was asked by a pious old lady if he saw any encouraging signs of the spread of religion. "I heard something," he said, rather hesitatingly, "which you might possibly call encouraging. As I passed, a woman cried out to her daughter, 'Jerushy Ann! you mean, snarly-headed cuss, come right in to prayers!'" "At another place," he added, "I asked a good woman if she had opportunities of hearing a good sermon. 'No,' she replied. 'Our only religious privileges consist of occasional funerals.'"

NOT long since some pious parents, not a thousand miles from Cedar Springs, concluded to disabuse the mind of their little daughter about there being a real Santa Claus, and so, after reminding her of the many times they had told her about that jolly personage and discovered that their teachings had been believed by the little girl, they boldly informed her that all her teachings on that subject were false, and that there was no Santa Claus. The little girl was wonder-struck, and after asking some questions and reflecting for some little time, significantly asked, "How is it about Jesus Christ? did you lie to me about him too?"

A SHORT time ago the Rev. Howard Crosby declared in public that no efforts to combat the vice of intemperance were available, unless backed up by a true Christian spirit. The incident which occurred at the Yorkville police court, however, goes far to disclose certain imperfections of the Christian temperance movement. T. T. Layard, who was brought before Justice Wandell to answer a charge of beastly intoxication, was recognized as being an active Christian temperance worker and the author of many lectures read in public meetings by men of the Crosby stamp. We are not to conclude by this that all Christian temperance workers are men who practice the contrary of what they preach, but with the above incident passed to their account, a little modesty in advocating the excellence of their system would not be out of place.—Truth.

THOMAS HARRISON, the boy evangelist, is reported insane in Buffalo, where he has been conducting revival meetings. Some of the Methodist clergymen of that city hav declared their belief in his lunacy, and protested against his continued exhibitions of wildness; but the pastor of the Asbury church is of a different opinion, and the meetings go on, drawing great crowds. "Not content with [illegible] form to chancel-rail," says the Courier, in an account of his conduct, he "took possession of the aisles, and even went so far as to climb upon the seats, or half way up the pulpit desk, stretching out his tall, thin body to its utmost hight, and swinging his arms. With coat sleeves pulled half way up to the elbows, he passed among the audience, making passes before their eyes; now prostrate in the aisles; now towering up from a pew back, with hands beating one another, or stretched to heaven, or pointing to some startled and unoffending spectator, or rapidly flirting the leaves of the Bible backward and forward; now uttering some stage whisper to the unrepentant sinner; then suddenly, without warning, shrieking out a disjointed sentence of thanksgiving or prayer, immediately afterward, perhaps, getting off a joke of the most questionable taste." He declared, on another evening, that twenty penitents were in the chancel, though there were only five, and that hundreds of hands were raised for prayers, whereas the number was exceedingly small.

A THOUGHTLESS little child, some four or five years old, clambered up onto the roof of his father's house in this city a few days ago, when he lost his footing, fell to the ground, was knocked senseless, and for several hours his life was despaired of, and even yet he is not out of danger. Now there is not a man in Duluth, no matter how great a heretic he is, indeed there is not a barbarous Sioux Indian on the continent, who, had he been standing near, would not hav prevented that little fellow from receiving that frightful fall had it been in his power to do so. According to the old musty, men-made creeds, however, "Our Father who art in heaven," who boasts of his possession of unlimited power, and who professes to love his children so well, stood by and looked on with the utmost indifference and never "moved a peg" to help that little fellow when his feet began to slip and stretched not forth his hand to break the little fellow's fall, although the old Jewish mythology called the Bible, and the old men-made creeds, ask us to believe that he could hav done so just as easily as falling off a log. The clergy prate a good deal about God's "loving kindness and tender mercies," but just at the time that the little boy above referred to was falling and needed a God, if indeed there is such a being in the universe, it appears that God (if there is a God) stood by with his hands, as it were, in his breeches pockets and offered no assistance. Now those who wish to love and admire a God of this sort can do so, but for ourself, we prefer to "tie to" a God who has both the ability and the will to help a fellow when he needs help; who, in an emergency like the above, and especially in the case of a little child, would not wait to be called upon for help; but who would waive all formalities and technicalities and "pitch in" and make himself useful whenever an opportunity is offered. Should we ever become satisfied that there is a God of this sort in existence, we will endeavor to cultivate his acquaintance, and we will cheerfully and gratuitously "speak a good word for him" to the thousands and thousands of readers of this great family religious journal.—Duluth Tribune.

A SCANDAL, involving a very pious young professor, has just developed in a female seminary at Keylesburg, Indiana. At the beginning of the present scholastic year, a graduate of Harvard University, named Homer Eaton, was engaged to fill the professorship of English literature in Mount Hope seminary for the education of young ladies. Eaton was a proficient scholar, and a gentleman in his appearance and address. He had strong religious convictions and taught a class in one of the Sunday-schools. Last Monday Professor Eaton suddenly disappeared, and inquiries after him were answered by his late teacher associates in a very vague and unsatisfactory manner. On the several trains that day the parents of young ladies arrived, and proceeded straight to the seminary, acting very mysteriously. The almost incredible statement is made that during his few months' connection with the institution he has seduced a large number of the girls, his victims being mostly members of the junior class, which came directly under his supervision. His modus operandi in each case appears to hav been, first, indulgence as a teacher, then profession of love, after which ruin was easily accomplished under promise of marriage. It is alleged that seventeen young ladies, ranging from fifteen to eighteen years of age, hav confessed to improper relations with the pious young professor. The awful secret was divulged last Sunday morning by Miss Ella Bertram, one of the older girls, who, under promise of marriage, had yielded to Eaton's desires. Subsequently she observed Eaton's attention to other of her classmates, and, suspecting treachery, watched him, and discovered enough to convince her he was a base villain and deceiver. She confronted him in the presence of the faculty last Sunday morning, but he coolly denied the truth of her grave charges and demanded a full and minute investigation at the hands of his associates. That night, however, he suddenly disappeared, and has not been seen or heard of since. Every effort will be made to ferret him out and punish him for his heartless crimes. Three of his young victims are said to be enciente. Eaton's parents liv at Ipswich, Mass., and are highly respectable people.

SENATOR MCDONALD, of Indiana, a Democrat, has introduced into the Senate a bill to refund to the University of Notre Dame du Lac, of St. Joseph county, Indiana, the sum of two thousand three hundred and thirty-four dollars and seventy cents, being the amount of duty paid on sundry importations of paintings on glass, imported from Europe by that noted Roman Catholic institution. The law, as it stands on the statute books, allows the importation free of duty of philosophical and scientific apparatus, instruments, and preparations, statuary, casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris, paintings, drawings or etchings, specially imported in good faith for the use of any society or institution incorporated or established for philosophical, educational, literary or scientific purposes. It also allows the introduction without duty of regalia and gems and statues and specimens of sculpture, specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes. It was under this latter provision that the Romish firm in New York swindled the government for years by getting papist priests to make affidavits on blanks that the articles mentioned were intended for the use of a society established for a religious purpose, and then filling up the blank with ten, twenty, or a hundred times in value what the priest had really ordered. It would seem to any reasonable mind that the free list as above quoted was ample enough to meet the rightful demands of any educational institution. But the University of Notre Dame is the crack theological seminary of the Romish church in America. Good American plate glass will not do for its windows. It must hav them filled with stained glass images of saints and other devices, and must get these from abroad. It was required to pay duty on these extravagances, just as any other importers would hav paid. No other society asks to be relieved from the payment of such duties; but with the bold effrontery always characteristic of the church of the everlasting beggars, these priests and nuns of Notre Dame come to Congress demanding that a special act of Congress shall be passed to refund the $2,634 paid in duties for their extravagant church ornaments,

Will the Coming Man Worship God?

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

That religions, considered as systems of doctrine, have been developed from simple conditions, many theologians are willing to concede; but they all continue to maintain that religion, considered as an element of the human mind or a predisposition to worship, is a primordial part of man's nature, with which he must have been endowed when he came from the hand of his maker. And as certainly as thirst implies water and hunger food, as certainly as fear implies something to dread, and affection beings to love, the religious element of man's nature, it is affirmed, presupposes a personal intelligent being whom it is our duty to reverence and adore.

But if the theory of evolution be true, religion, regarded as an element of human nature, as far as it is such, as well as a body of doctrine, has come into existence naturally with the development of the race. If man has a relationship with the animals below him, and has risen from the condition of creatures incapable of religious ideas and devoid of a religious nature, then his tendency to worship, not less than his belief in regard to the power that he worships, must have been acquired; in which case it presupposes those causes only which have combined to produce this tendency.

The evidence seems to be abundant that there are tribes on the earth to-day entirely destitute of religion; or, if they have it at all, it is in such a rudimentary condition that travelers are unable to observe any indications of it. Of a tribe of Bechuanas, Moffat, who was among them many years, says: "The people have many ceremonies and superstitions, believe in the influence of witchcraft and charms; but no one of them has the remotest reference to religion. They have no knowledge whatever of idols or anything intended to represent an invisible power, and consequently have nothing of a religious character" (Enc. Brit., art. Bechuanas).

"There is," says Darwin, "ample evidence, derived, not from hasty travelers, but from men who have long resided with savages, that numerous races have existed, and still exist, who have no idea of one or more gods, and who have no words in their languages to express such an idea" (Des. of Man, vol. i, p. 63).

Lubbock, in his "Origin of Civilization" and "Prehistoric Times," quotes the testimonies of many travelers and explorers to show that there are numerous tribes without religion, and remarks himself that "sailors, traders, and philosophers, Roman Catholic priests, and Protestant missionaries, in ancient and in modern times, in every part of the globe, have concurred in stating that there are races of men altogether devoid of religion. . . . The question as to the general existence of religion among men is indeed to a great extent a matter of definition. If the mere sensation of fear and the recognition that there are probably other beings more powerful than man are sufficient alone to constitute a religion, then we must, I think, admit that religion is general to the human race. But when a child dreads the darkness and shrinks from a lightless room, we never regard that as evidence of religion. Moreover, if these definitions be adopted, we cannot longer regard religion as peculiar to man. We must admit that the feeling of a dog or a horse towards its master is of the same character, and the baying of a dog to the moon is as much an act of worship as some ceremonies which have been so described by travelers" (Origin of Civilization, p. 121).

The statement of Lubbuck, that there are tribes devoid of religion unless indeed we no "longer regard religion as peculiar to man," is significant. It indicates that there is no sharp dividing line between religious and unreligious creatures, and of itself is sufficient to suggest that as the higher religions hav been evolved from the lower ones, so the lowest religions have grown out of conditions with which we are accustomed to associate nothing of a religious character. Certain it is, there are tribes in which the intellectual faculties are so feeble that the phenomena of nature have as yet scarcely become an object of thought. According to the theory of evolution, all the higher races of men have come up through stages in which the lowest on earth yet remain. Who can doubt that the men who lived in the earlier ages of human existence were as destitute of religion as are the Bechuanas or Arafuras of to-day? Of the intellectual condition of man in a very remote past, we know something from the rough implements of stone which have outlasted the bones of the rude men who made them.

"Religiously," says Winchell, "there is little to be affirmed or inferred of the paleolithic tribes. Some curiously wrought flints may have served as religious emblems; and the discovery of deposits of food near the body of the dead may very naturally be regarded as evidence of a belief in future life" (Adamites and Preadamites, p. 36).

But there was a yet more remote and a more rude stone age. And there must have been yet earlier ages in which man lived, and was able to leave no memorial of his existence, and during which, in a religious point of view, he was still more like the brute mentally than at the time he is first brought to our notice by prehistoric archæology. Occupied for ages in contests with wild beasts and obtaining food, his life was of a kind not adapted to favor the contemplation of natural phenomena, and when, after ages of mental development under exceptionally favorable circumstances, he began to form ideas and to frame hypotheses, they must have been very simple, crude, and indistinct.

How natural that he should invest inanimate objects with his own thoughts and feelings! Here is indicated an intellectual condition hardly above that of the brutes. "My dog," says Darwin, "a full-grown and very sensible animal, was lying on the lawn during a hot and still day; but at a little distance a slight breeze occasionally moved an open parasol, which would have been wholly disregarded by the dog had any one stood near it. As it was, every time that the parasol slightly moved, the dog growled fiercely and barked. He must, I think, have reasoned to himself in a rapid and unconscious manner that movement without any apparent cause indicated the presence of some strange living agent, and no stranger had a right to be on his territory" (Destiny of Man, vol. i, p. 65).

"An authentic case is on record of a skye-terrier," says Fiske, "being accustomed to obtain favors from his master by sitting on his haunches, will also sit before his pet India-rubber ball placed on the chimney-piece, evidently beseeching it to jump down and play with him. Such a fact as this is quite in harmony with Auguste Comte's suggestion that such intelligent animals as dogs, apes, and elephants may be capable of forming a few fetichistic notions. The behavior of the terrier here rests upon the assumption that the ball is open to the same sort of entreaty which prevails with the master; which implies, not that the wistful brute accredits the ball with a soul, but that in his mind the distinction between life and inanimate existence has never been thoroughly established. Just this confusion between things living and things not living is present throughout the whole philosophy of fetichism, and the confusion between things seen and things dreamed, which suggests the notion of another self, belongs to this same twilight stage of intelligence, in which primeval man has not yet clearly demonstrated his immeasurable superiority to the brutes" (Myth and Myth-Makers, pp. 221–2).

With these facts in mind, it is evident, as McLennan remarks, that "the simplest hypothesis, and the first to occur to men, seems to have been that natural phenomena are ascribable to the presence in animals, plants, and things, and in the forces of nature, of such spirits prompting to action as men are conscious they themselves possess" (Fortnightly Review, 1869, p. 422).

"Man," says Goethe, "is a true Narcissus; he delights to see his own image everywhere; and he spreads himself underneath the universe like the amalgam behind the glass." Thus man, projecting his own nature unconsciously out upon the field of natural phenomena, investing the objects around him with his own thoughts and feelings, commences worship by contemplating himself. To early man pieces of wood and stone were intelligent objects, and he sought to win their favor and secure their aid. Later he invests with his own nature the mountains, rivers, and clouds, the sun, moon, and stars; and when the power of abstraction increases with the development of reason and imagination, he forms conceptions of beings more or less like himself, but invisible to the eye and incognizable to all the senses.

"We still say," says Mill, "the sun rises and sets and comes to the meridian, the sea ebbs and flows. Languages were formed by men who believed these objects to have life and active power in themselves" (Logic, vol. i, p. 364).

"Man paints himself in his gods," says Schiller; and the character of his gods is determined by his own, for the reason that he worships, unconsciously to himself, his own qualities abstracted from himself and viewed objectively, whether in the piece of wood, the passing clouds, the flowing stream, the quiet stars, the changing moon, or the glorious sun; whether in a personal being sitting on a throne with a crown on his head and a scepter in his hand, or in a power that

> "Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze, > Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees"

With malice and revenge in his own heart, he cannot help believing he is surrounded by beings who delight in making him suffer and to whom he therefore prays in fear and trembling. Nature, in her pleasant moods, excites opposite feelings. The genial sunshine, abundant game, health, success in combat, whatever gratifies him, he ascribes to beings who possess the good qualities of which he is conscious in himself; and to them he prays in reverent recognition of their superior power, in grateful acknowledgment of his own dependence, and with an eager desire to secure a continuance of these blessings. Religion, then, considered as a belief or hypothesis and as a practice of devotional rites and ceremonies, is seen to have a natural basis and to be due to natural causes. It depends upon two factors: qualities of the human mind, fear, selfishness, gratitude, wonder, admiration, etc., and the external world whose phenomena are ever present to the mind of man.

But here it will be asked, How came man to have a religious nature, a tendency to worship which in the individual is antecedent to experience, which now depends not upon any observation of nature, which depends not upon experiences such as those through which our savage ancestors passed? The answer, in the light of modern psychology, is not difficult to give, at least in a general way. In the course of ages, states of mind produced by the outward world have become organized in the race in the form of tendencies. A father who has acquired the habit of drunkenness may transmit to his offspring the result of his experience in the form of an appetite for stimulants. There are islands having species of animals and birds possessing an instinctive fear of man, but which exhibited no fear of him when man first visited those islands. Man by his destructive agency has produced in these animals sensations which by repetition, and by the transmission of the results on the brain and nervous system through successive generations, have become condensed and fixed in the species as an instinct which, whenever man, who first produced the impression, appears, manifests itself in a very positive manner. So the shepherd dog and sporting dogs have characteristics which, although originally acquired, are now innate or instinctive. Thus that which is learned, whether from a personal teacher or by contact with nature, and is repeated through centuries, may produce states of mind which by heredity appear in the descendants in the form of aptitudes or predispositions. "Instinct is inherited habit," or, more properly, insticts are states of mind produced by habits, and by repetition and transmission organized in the race. Although innate in the individual, they are due to ancestral experiences. We are full of these tendencies, some good, others bad. We have to some extent aptitude for music, mechanics, poetry, oratory, philosophy, language. We have tendencies to temperance or intemperance, to chastity or licentiousness, to truthfulness or falsehood, to courage or cowardice. These tendencies of mind, as well as bodily characteristics, come to us as a legacy from former generations, and, although independent of our individual experience, have been acquired by our ancestors. We are not born with innate ideas, but it is unquestionable that we come into the world with organisms whose actions and reactions are largely determined by the form and quality of structure, and they include all those results of generations which appear in us as aptitudes and intuitions.

I believe, then, that our religious nature, as far as we possess such a nature, is due ultimately to the experiences of our ancestors. The contemplation of nature and the disposition to worship induced by ages of experience, during which fear, admiration, wonder, gratitude, and reverence have been constantly excited, have resulted in a predisposition to worship, which, although due to experience in the race, is now a priori in the individual wherever it is found. Thus much as to the natural genesis of religion considered as a part of man's nature.

Outside of the human mind it presupposes, not a personal being who implanted it in man, and the worship of whom is man's highest and noblest duty, but that world of phenomena, with all its wealth and variety, with all its beauty and deformity, which confronted our earliest ancestors as it confronts us to-day. The instinctive fear of man exhibited by wild animals implies the existence of man and those destructive acts which excited their dread and terror. And if the religious tendencies of man have been acquired in the manner indicated, they presuppose, in addition to the susceptible mind, not a supernatural being who endowed man with a religious nature when he appeared on the earth, but the material world that impressed him and produced those mental states, which have been repeated and the results transmitted in the form of a predisposition to worship. There is nothing in the religious instinct that determines the particular form or character of the object of worship. That depends upon the intellectual and moral condition of the worshiper, due chiefly to the instruction he has personally received from parents and teachers.

But in every stage of religious thought, as we have seen, from the lowest fetichism to the loftiest monotheism, the real object of man's fear, reverence, or devotion is the qualities of the human mind with which he invests the external world. Man cannot rise above or get beyond his own nature. Of beings having characteristics essentially different from his own, he cannot possibly conceive. He may imagine, on some distant star, beings higher than himself or different in their external appearances, yet the positive and final predicates which he gives to these beings are necessarily drawn from his own nature. An analysis of all such conceptions will show that although we can extend our thoughts quantitatively, yet the quality of our thoughts is determined by our nature and surroundings. We can have ideals superior to ourselves as individuals, but no ideals the elements of which do not exist in the species to which we belong.

Keeping in view this obvious principle, a rigid analysis of religion will enable us to see that, as a system of thought in which phenomena are ascribed to a being or to beings who are believed to be proper objects of worship, it is an indirect form of self-knowledge. As Feuerbach has shown with much fullness and variety of illustration, man unconsciously studies his own nature in the contemplation of gods long before his intellectual and moral nature becomes a direct object of study.

In every age man discovers and recognizes that what was in a preceding age regarded as the true god was the subjective nature of man viewed objectively. When a nation or a race has outgrown a religion, the old god comes to be regarded only as a conceptional being corresponding with the mental condition of the times in which it prevailed. The picture taken in childhood cannot be looked upon as a correct likeness of the same individual grown to manhood. No more can man be pleased with the mental image of himself that was formed during his intellectual childhood. As between the likeness of the youth and that of the man, there is more or less resemblance, so between the gods of two periods, separated by ages and widely different in their intellectual condition, there will be much in common.

The profoundly religious man of to-day never recognizes the identity between himself and the object of his worship; but he sees the applicability of this principle in times and among people having conceptions of God that are gross and low. The enlightened Christian readily admits this to be true of the ignorant savage. The well-informed Christian and the enlightened Hebrew of to-day admit that many of the Old Testament representations of deity are very imperfect, aud they apologize for their grossness by saying that God in those days accommodated himself to the rude, ignorant condition of the people, since they were unable to entertain any conceptions of God unless they were of a being like themselves. But it is just as certain that the conception of God by the theologian of to-day is a conception of the nature of man; and whenever the Theist has recourse to volition to supply the nexus between cause and effect, he unconsciously invests nature with his own human personality.
